Palestinian Authority police chief orders crackdown on Hamas

By GIDEON LEVY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority police chief Ghazi Jibali has denounced the Hamas, and ordered officers under his command to shoot "in the leg" any Hamas member who gets close to them.

Jibali spoke to Ha'aretz after a statement published by Iz a Din al Kassam, the military wing of Hamas, threatened the Palestinian Authority.

The Palestinian general, speaking in his Gaza office, sounded determined and angry at Hamas, calling its activities a betrayal of the Palestinian people. "We are not afraid of anyone, and what Hamas did in its last [terror] attack is a betrayal and the ruination of the peace process. If the attack in Gush Katif had succeeded, we would have been depicted in the world as murderers of children," Jibali said.

"I want to thank the soldiers in the jeep who prevented a huge tragedy and express my condolences to the family of the soldier who was killed. I told my police officers that that soldier is a huge hero."

Jibali said that the suicide bomber was Suhayb Timraz, 19, a college student and Jibalya resident who was not known as a Hamas activist. He said he handed over some of the man's body parts to Israel for DNA testing to verify his identity.

Jibali showed Ha'aretz the letter that Timraz left behind: "Forgive me my brother for going up to heaven without saying goodbye. In heaven I will meet God and the Prophet."

"He forgot," Jibali said, "that God doesn't permit the killing of children. That young man isn't going heavenward and won't go to paradise because he tried to kill innocent children. We won't let that happen."

"I personally am willing to be in the patrol that guards the settlers' buses because our role is to protect them," Jibali added.

Jibali said that some 300 Hamas activists had been arrested in the Gaza Strip, including 30 to 40 from the organization's military wing.

Meanwhile, friends and family of Timraz gathered at the family's home in the Jibalya refugee camp yesterday. Jibali said the PA police will not permit a mourners' tent to be erected. Timraz's relatives refused to speak to reporters yesterday, and said they are not convinced that their missing son is indeed the suicide bomber.

Meanwhile, Lebanon's Hezbollah called on the Palestinians to kill PA chair Yasser Arafat for signing the Wye agreement last month. Speaking at a mass rally to denounce the Wye Memorandum, the group's leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, branded Arafat a traitor, and told the Palestinians to attack Israelis to foil the accord.

Israel, U.S. sign strategic agreement

The MOA, which comes on the heels of the Wye agreement, was discussed quietly between the two leaders at the summit, as well as in meetings earlier this year. U.S. Embassy spokesperson Larry Schwartz said the pact was not a guarantee of U.S. military assistance in the event of ballistic missile attacks targeting Israel.

"It is a rock-solid commitment to Israel's security, not a defence treaty which would require us to do something in the event of an attack," Schwartz said.

A team of experts and the heads of the defence establishment will help determine the details of the various plans that fall under the umbrella of the strategic memorandum. Israel Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai's upcoming trip to Washington is aimed in part at addressing this.

The move was seen in Washington as an attempt to give Netanyahu political support if he goes ahead with implementation of the Wye accord, including a withdrawal from the West Bank.

The political support will be backed by general defence aid. Clinton specifically said that aid to Israel may not be used for military investment in the territories. Israel has already made a $1.2-billion request for aid.

Meanwhile, several hundred million dollars in emergency funds from the United States are being set aside to aid the Palestinian Authority.

Emergency funds set aside for PA

The missile threat from Iran forms the background of the new strategic agreement. After Israel and the United States failed to prevent Russia and China from offering aid to the Iranian missile program, Israeli and U.S. intelligence began drafting – independently – new approaches to the problem.

U.S. intelligence came to the conclusion that despite domestic political change in Iran, Tehran is conducting an energetic effort to develop long-range missile capabilities.

Yet there is a consensus among U.S. intelligence authorities that Iran won't be satisfied with long-range missile capacities, but also seeks a nonconventional payload.

The United States is concerned about its failure to persuade Moscow to halt military aid to Iran. Changes in the Russian government and the rise of Victor Primakov to the premiership have created a new situation. American sources say that senior officials with whom they had been in discussion in Moscow are no longer in office, and that effectively, they have nobody to talk to there.

The effort to prevent the development of long-range missiles by Iran has been deemed a failure. Lately there have been intelligence reports that the Primakov government authorized the extension of nuclear aid to Iran. At the heart of the memo is a framework for future planning around long-range missiles and nonconventional weapons in Iran – and, after the lifting of sanctions, in Iraq.

Vatican symposium looks at Inquisition

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican recently convened a three-day symposium on the Inquisition as part of its official policy of reflection on its past failings.

More than two dozen world experts and scholars on the Inquisition took part in last week's closed-door sessions.

Their purpose, Cardinal Roger Etchegaray told the meeting's first session, was to expound "the results of their research, with the aim of allowing us to reach a greater knowledge and a better comprehension" of the brutal persecutions that many consider one of the darkest chapters of Roman Catholic history.

"The church is not afraid to submit its past to the judgment of history," said Cardinal Etchegaray, who heads the Vatican's commission for the grand Jubilee, which oversees events planned for the millennium.

Some scholars will present the results of their investigations on the Inquisition, made since Vatican archives were officially opened for research on the topic in January.

The Inquisition, which lasted from the 13th to the early 19th centuries, was a permanent tribunal of the church aimed at investigating, rooting out and combating heresy. Its methods were often brutal, encompassing the torture, interrogation and burning at the stake of many thousands of people.

"The church cannot cross the threshold of the new millennium without pressing its children to purify themselves in repentance for their errors, infidelity, incoherence and slowness," Cardinal Etchegaray said.

Archer takes aim at future Olympic Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tom Brodie has heard all the jokes before. The ones about William Tell and Robin Hood. The one about shooting an apple off of somebody's head. Mostly, kids who don't know much about the sport of archery tell those jokes.

Joking aside, for Brodie, archery is a serious business. It has taken him to Cuba and Sweden for international competitions. It has led the Israeli national coach to try to recruit him. It has led his family to shell out tens of thousands of dollars for top-of-the-line equipment and for travel expenses. It has led Brodie, at age 16, to dream a not-so-impossible dream, that he will represent Canada at the 2004 and 2008 Olympic Games.

For Brodie, archery is a serious sport, not something that should be relegated to medieval days or old black and white adventure films. It's a sport that requires strength, skill, determination and concentration, all elements he possesses in abundant supply.

Start with the strength part. At six-foot-two, 203 lbs., he's big enough to play defence in the NHL or box as a heavyweight. In his sport, Brodie uses his strength to repeatedly pull back on the heavy- gauge nylon bowstrings that are tightened with a tension-inducing camshaft system. He does so, sometimes 200 times a day. In addition, he has to raise the 10-lb. bow with his extended left arm, hold it rock steady and take careful aim through the viewpiece before letting the arrow fly.

Having excelled at the technical aspects of the sport, he's also mastered its mental elements. He's able to hold his concentration and not fade under pressure, as is the wont of other archers in tight competition.

Capping it all off is his willingness to spend lots of time honing his craft, often spending 20 to 25 hours a week on the target range.

Earlier this year, Brodie's hard work began to pay off – big time. In Windsor in February, he vaulted out of the high school and club archery scene to win the gold medal as the Canadian Indoor Junior Champion. He followed that up with a second place finish in all divisions in the 1998 Golden Arrow Championship, and then a first place finish in the 1998 Ontario High School Archery Championship in May.

Not bad, but it was just a warmup.

Named to the Canadian National Archery Team, Brodie represented Canada at the 14th Championship of the Americas in Havana in June, winning the gold medal as Champion of the Western Hemisphere.

A month later, in Sunne, Sweden, Brodie again represented the True North in the 5th Junior World Archery Championships, while in September, he took home the gold medal from the Canadian Outdoor Junior Championships in Caledon.

Impressed? And that's only a partial record of his achievements in 1998 – a real breakthrough year for him.

As with most endeavors, it took a lot of hard work to become an overnight success. Brodie got his start in archery only five years ago, thanks to a neighbor already involved in the sport. He enjoyed it and became a casual archer, practicing at the Caledon Club. Two years ago, he ratcheted his interest into high gear, acquired a very good bow, and started practicing more frequently.

"I wanted to be more competitive... I wanted to be good," he said.

Enrolled in the High Performance Athlete (HPA) program at Thornhill Secondary School, Brodie received the time he needed to devote to the sport.

With plenty of practice, he was able to get his score up to 55x out of 60x, closing in on perfection. (The x is the centre of the target. Fifty-five x means he hit the bullseye 55 times out of 60 tries. Archers also receive a point score for getting close to the centre of the target.)

At 55x, many archers come up against a formidable psychological roadblock, Brodie said. But his coach, Mike Weiler of the Colby Shooting Club in Waterloo, has helped him overcome it. "He changed everything," Brodie said, "my bow, my stance, my mental approach."

His training paid off handsomely in Cuba at the Championship of the Americas. The outdoor competition drew participants from 19 countries, including three Canadian juniors. Brodie launched 200 arrows in the week-long event, and scored 1305 points out of 1440, shooting at distances of 30-, 50-, 70- and 90 metres.

When it came down to the crunch, Brodie faced a Brazilian for the gold.

By that time, he'd created quite a stir among the competitors and their coaches, who'd never before seen the big Canadian kid. Unlike the polite audience response in golf or tennis, archery fans scream and shout as if they were at a hockey game, so when it came time to decide the gold medallists, the fans were pretty noisy, Brodie said. Their cheers didn't bother him, however.

"When it comes down to elimination rounds, I'm intimidating," he said. "I don't talk. I let my shooting do the talking for me."

Getting into a "Zen-like" zone, Brodie fought off any jitters.

"I just relax," he said. "I liked it. I was just tanning out in the sun."

Victory was his.

A month later, at the World Championships in Sweden, Brodie had to battle not only the other archers, but the environment as well. In the midst of the competition, Brodie suffered a severe allergy attack brought on by pollen. His eyes puffed up so he could barely see. The yellow bullseye became just a blur for him.

Needing help just to get to the shooting line, Brodie performed as if on autopilot. He shot an impressive 1255 out of 1440. The 1305 he scored in Cuba would have put him in the top 10 in the world.

Following that difficult trip, Brodie took time off to relax and recover. Next on his agenda is a tournament in Las Vegas in March, followed by the U.S. national championship in Tulsa.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

העולה שירד לחיי, סיפורי אפרים קישון והסיפור מאחוריהם מאת שרה קישון, הוצאת נוונים, 1998

היום, בשנת החמישים למדינה, כשאנו מובלבלים וחיים בצלו של חזון שהיה וחשים כיותמים, ללא מנהיגות וללא השראה, ולנוכח הפילוג האיום בשורות הלאום, כה מתגעגע הנשמה לאפרים קישון והנה, ממש בזמן הנכון, יוצא לאור ספרה של אשתו, שרה קישון והברכה על ראשה. העולה שירד לחיי יעלה בנו נשכחות מתוקות.

הוא אהב ספרות אך היה מאוהב בתיאטרון את הקרקס שנא וטען שאינו רוצה לראות חיות שנוהגות כבני אדם. די לו שראה בני-אדם שנהגו פחיות רעות. בטעם אוכל לא הבין הרבה ופעם, כשנשאל, בבעל תואר דוקטור-כבוד לפילוסופיה אודות "הטוב האופטימלי" של קאנט, השיב שהטוב המקסימלי בעולמנו הוא הסלאמי ההונגרי

על מנת לשפר את העברית היה משנן כל בוקר, בזמן הגילוח, משפטי תנ"ך ותלמוד ולמד בעל-פה מילון עברי מכבד עברית, אפרים לימד עצמו גם אנגלית וגרמנית תמיד הצטער שלא למד צרפתית והיה מסיף "לצערי במחנות הריכוז לא לימדו צרפתית". הוא סבל מדכאונות פתאומיים אך היה נלחם במצבי רוח קודרים חשכה העציבה אותו תל-כן היה מאיר כל מקום בו נמצא

בסיום הספר מביע אפרים קישון את תודתו לאשתו ולא בהכרח עבור הספר אלא בשל שנים ארוכות, ומן הסתם, לא קלות, לצידו. תודתו אל שרה מתוונה אך משכנעת. "מאשה נרועה נפרדים בשירה עליזה. וחוזרים בלי קושי לרוטות המבורכת. אפס משרה אי-אפשר להיפרד מפני שהיא אשה טובה מאוד, לכל הרוחות."

About families

Dear Susan,

My 8-year-old daughter took an art project to school recently and was shocked to find it had been deliberately tampered with. What words of comfort can I offer my daughter? How shall I broach the issue with her teacher?

Dear Reader,

I am sorry to hear that someone deliberately set out to sabotage your daughter's project. Your first order of business is to reassure your daughter, as she will likely view this event as a personal violation. It is important for you to emphasize that it is not right for someone to destroy someone else's project. She must understand that this illustrates an inappropriate and unacceptable lack of respect.

Be sure to encourage your daughter to express her feelings. Part of the job of parents is to shield their children from the cruelties and inequities of the world until their children are ready to accept and confront these bitter realities. As time goes on, those realities are brought home by events such as the one your daughter was forced to contend with. The key thing is to ensure that she understands the fundamental reality of what has happened to her, while at the same time retaining a balance and sense of perspective that will ensure that this event does not come to dominate her world view.

You have also broached the possibility of speaking to your daughter's teacher. While your daughter must learn to understand and accept what has happened to her, it is critical that she perceives that justice has been served. At her age, it is important that she retain some faith in a just and balanced world. The teacher should raise this problem with the class and make it very clear that this type of behavior will not be tolerated. Your daughter will likely have seen this violation of her property as a very personal threat. The teacher must reassure her that he or she will set appropriate limits with the class, in order to ensure that your daughter retains a sense of personal security and safety.

I hope your daughter comes away feeling empowered and not victimized as a result of both her parents and teacher appreciating the seriousness of the event and taking speedy and sensitive steps to address it.

Susan Leventhal is a psychotherapist with 20 years of experience.

Islamic Jihad sent bombers

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian investigators have concluded that the two terrorists who were killed in last Friday's attack in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market were sent by a local branch of Islamic Jihad operating out of Jenin.

The town is located within Area A, which is under the control of the Palestinian Authority, though both men lived in villages in Area B, under Israeli security control.

A search is now under way for a senior Islamic Jihad official in the Jenin area who is suspected of involvement in the attack.

The Palestinian security authorities arrested five Islamic Jihad activists in Jenin and three in the Bethlehem area, while the Israeli security forces arrested seven men from the village where the second terrorist in the bombing lived.

Two things were clear from the outcome of the blast: the operation was botched, and the current operational level of the Islamic terrorist organizations in the West Bank makes it difficult for them to carry out massive showcase attacks.

The two terrorists were known to the security establishment as Islamic Jihad activists, and had served terms in an Israeli prison for security-related offences until they were recently released.

Security sources said the bombs were of a "very low professional level, almost primitive." The series of explosions that preceded the large explosion indicates that their operating mechanism may have malfunctioned.

Almost immediately after news broke of the bomb blast at Machane Yehuda, calls of "death to the Arabs" were heard throughout the Jerusalem market. As in previous incidents, a

Election Commentary

The Nov. 30 Quebec election has been described by some observers as the most important political contest the province has witnessed in several decades. It is a battle between two political giants, as Premier Lucien Bouchard faces provincial Liberal leader Jean Charest, the person deemed best able to defeat the leader of the sovereigntist forces.

When Charest first appeared on the Quebec political scene early in the year, federalists felt a new sense of optimism about the prospect of reacquiring power and putting a stop to the threat of another referendum.

Enthusiasm amongst federalists was supported by public opinion polls that gave the Charest-led Liberals a commanding lead over

Pamphlets Cause Stir

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish Community Council and local police have fielded several complaints about a pamphlet entitled The Silver Bullet, which was distributed in downtown Calgary. Ethnic groups allege the pamphlets contain anti-Semitic and anti-Asian remarks.

Pachter Mourned

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada is mourning the death of Harry Pachter, a former national president of the organization. Pachter was instrumental in forming District 22. Through the travel agency he helped found, he organized numerous trips and missions to Israel.

ISRAEL

Israel Denies Passport Story

JERUSALEM — There is "no basis" to last week's CTV W5 report that Israel is continuing to use Canadian passports in spy operations, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's media advisor said in a statement last week. "The Mossad does not use Canadian passports," the terse statement said.

W5 reported that Israel is still using Canadian passports in spy missions, despite its pledge a year ago to stop the practice. The show reported that at least two Canadian expatriates in Israel allegedly gave up their passports in response to requests from the Mossad, and that one of them later retrieved the document.

Israel pledged to stop using Canadian passports in spy missions following last autumn's botched bid by Mossad agents to assassinate a Hamas leader in Jordan. The agents were found to be carrying fake Canadian passports. Also last week, Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy said one of the former Canadian's claims were investigated and dismissed.

Holocaust Conference

JERUSALEM — Two Canadian experts are addressing a conference here this week on providing emotional support and treatment for Holocaust survivors. Dr. Robert Krell, a Vancouver psychiatrist, is speaking on working with survivors and their families, while Paula David, a social worker at the Baycrest Centre, is addressing working with aging survivors. The two-day conference is sponsored by Amcha, which provides support services for survivors in Israel.

PM Releases Letters

JERUSALEM — Hoping to win further backing for the Wye accord, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week released four U.S. letters of guarantees to Israel. In one, the U.S. ambassador to Israel reiterated Washington's opposition to a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood. Palestinian negotiators said the Palestinian Authority is not "governed by letters of guarantee, but by the agreements signed."

WORLD

Canadian Rabbis Honored

NEW YORK — Two Canadian rabbis received honorary degrees from the Jewish Theological Seminary at its fall convocation. Rabbi Charles Feinberg of Vancouver and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Toronto received honorary degrees for their service to the Jewish community and the Conservative movement.

Mitch Destroys Shul

TEGUCIGALPA — Hurricane Mitch has destroyed the Honduran capital's lone synagogue. Earlier this year, the 30 or so family members of Communidad Evreya B'Tegucigalpa made the final payments on the small shul, bought prayer books and installed a bimah.

The storm destroyed everything, save for one of the two Torahs brought to Honduras by immigrants from Germany shortly before World War II.

Jews in Congress

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate will have a record number of Jews – 11 – after Rep. Chuck Schumer defeated high-profile incumbent Senator Alfonse D'Amato in a New York senate race.

The new Congress will have 23 Jewish members, down from 25 in the previous one. There will be three Jewish newcomers in the House of Representatives. Jewish voters across the United States overwhelmingly voted for Democratic candidates by a 78 percent to 21 percent margin.

Arafat Criticized

TEHRAN — Iran's supreme leader has condemned the latest Israeli-Palestinian peace deal and branded Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat a "lackey" of Israel.

Speaking to Muslim worshippers and dignitaries at Tehran University, Ayatollah Ali Khameini said the peace deal is doomed to fail, and he challenged Arafat's legitimacy as leader of the Palestinian people. His comments prompted speculation that he will authorize additional funding to militant groups in the Palestinian self-rule areas.

Advisory: Numbers in Ads for U.S. Citizens Only

TORONTO — Recent advertisements in some Jewish media outlets, other than The CJN, have incorrectly listed toll-free telephone numbers for inquiries into how to obtain money from funds established by Swiss banks.

Holocaust survivors and their heirs should be advised that the 1-800 numbers listed in these ads are for U.S. citizens only.

There were two toll-free numbers advertised, one for registering for the Swiss dormant account fund, and another for inquiries into the special humanitarian fund for needy survivors. Both are for Americans only.

In Canada, Rabbi Gunther Plaut is heading a committee that will disburse $2.5 million allotted by Swiss banks to needy survivors.

Rabbi Plaut says he is considering setting up a toll-free line in Canada, similar to the one in the United States.

Canada has yet to set up an apparatus to deal with the dormant account fund.

The CJN will print updates as events warrant.

Young Jews urged to preserve survivors' memory

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Inaugurating Holocaust Education Week at the Leah Posluns Theatre late last month, an Auschwitz concentration camp survivor urged Jews to perpetuate the past.

Holocaust Education Week

See pages 22, 23 & 24 for more coverage

"Remember and never forget," intoned Ernest Michel, a 75-year-old American who witnessed Kristallnacht in Mannheim, Germany, on Nov. 9, 1938.

The younger generation, he said, is duty bound to preserve the memory of the survivors, not only for the sake of the six million victims of the Holocaust but for the benefit of future generations.

Michel, who had a 52-year career with the UJA Federation in New York City, said that Jews live in an entirely different world today.

Rather than being weak and silent as in the 1930s and 1940s, Jews today are strong and stand up for their rights, and Israel has developed into a vibrant Jewish homeland.

Decrying the phenomenon of Holocaust denial, he called on survivors to tell their stories. But he advised them not to debate the deniers. "It's a no brainer," he declared.

Michel described the deportation of 15,000 Polish Jews from Germany in October 1938 as the "first step" in the Holocaust.

It was followed by Kristallnacht, the night of broken glass, a nation-wide pogrom touched off by the assassination of a German diplomat in Paris by Herschel Grynspan, a young man whose parents were among those who had been deported from Germany.

Accusing the Gestapo of having masterminded Kristallnacht, Michel said that the sight of a burning synagogue in his hometown will always be engraved in his mind.

In cataloguing the horrors of Kristallnacht, he said that 1,400 synagogues were destroyed and 300 Jews were murdered. In addition, 30,000 Jews were arrested.

He saw his parents for the last time in Mannheim's train station on Sept. 4, 1939. Three years later, they perished in Auschwitz, a camp to which he was eventually sent.

During the war, Michel endured six years in Nazi camps as well as a death march. He returned to Mannheim in June 1945, finding a shattered city. After working for the U.S. army, he covered the Nuremberg war crimes trial for a German news agency. In July 1946, he arrived in the United States as a displaced person.

Michel, whose autobiography, Promises to Keep, was published in 1993, joined the UJA after being a copy boy on a newspaper in Port Huron, Michigan.

In 1981, he initiated and organized the World Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors in Israel. Today, as a motivational speaker, he delivers lectures about the Holocaust throughout North America.

JF&CS takes steps to get homeless Jews off streets

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) is taking the first steps toward getting homeless Jews off the streets of Toronto.

The agency's newly struck committee on Jewish homeless met for the first time last week, but already, there seems to be a conflict between it and the social worker it has entrusted to search for Jews on the streets.

Lillian Freedman, a freelance social worker who has, to date, located five homeless Jews, wants a one-stop, community-wide agency that is more crisis-oriented than the approach JF&CS envisions.

As well, Freedman says she is shouldering personal expenses in her street search, and wonders what will happen to homeless Jews when her two-month mandate expires at the end of this month.

JF&CS is developing a program to deal with Jewish homelessness, "but there aren't the funds or the need to create a whole separate agency for this," executive director Gordon Wolfe told The CJN. "I don't believe there should be Jews out on the streets, but we have to incorporate this into our own services."

Those services include paying the first and last months' rent on housing, as well as topping up welfare payments, and keeping an eye on the formerly homeless, who can lapse back into transience.

"I guess we see the problem from a different perspective," a resigned Freedman told The CJN following last week's inaugural meeting of the committee. "That's fair enough. But I'm worried about people who don't fall into JF&CS's guidelines."

While Freedman has located five homeless Jews, JF&CS estimates there are as many as 12 in the downtown core.

Plan of action

Two of the five homeless Freedman has found are young men, both 20, who are now sharing an apartment. Both received temporary assistance from JF&CS.

Freedman speculates that JF&CS is worried that helping them will "open the floodgates" for other young people who leave their parents' home, to apply for help.

Freedman came to her task quite by accident. She found a homeless Jewish woman downtown, and approached JF&CS, which agreed to help [CJN, Oct. 22]. Freedman was given the agency's authority – and a float of $200 – to find homeless Jews and put them up in a hotel until more lasting arrangements could be made.

In addition to the two 20-year-olds, Freedman has found a 22-year-old woman of Yemenite background; a Russian and Yiddish-speaking 66-year-old woman who sleeps in a park on Bathurst Street at Antibes; and "Rachel," a 50-ish woman for whom she found an apartment and who helped launch Freedman's mission.

The Yemenite woman has been placed with a foster family and is employed. While Freedman knows of the 66-year-old woman, she has been unable to find her. And Rachel recently fled her downtown apartment after a scare from a neighbor. She spends days on the streets and returns home only at night.

At last week's meeting, Freedman presented her plan of action. She proposed a coordinated service for the Jewish homeless, funded by UJA Federation and private efforts, as a pilot project for the year 1999.

She would like a full-time coordinator for the project, two half-time staffers and volunteers, as well as a small office, telephone and cell phone.

But those are not likely to materialize, given JF&CS's position that the needs of the Jewish homeless can be folded into existing services.

"Nobody can convince me there's not a need for this," Freedman said. "A program has to be developed and funded in cooperation with the entire community, and not as something [JF&CS] can do behind closed doors."

Although Freedman is receiving a small salary for her efforts, she said she's been personally burdened by expenses she's incurred, and for which she's not being reimbursed.

The JF&CS committee won't meet again until Dec. 12, well after cold nights grip city streets. And Freedman's mandate expires Nov. 30.

"What happens after that?" she asked.

Reena proceeds with new home for older adults

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's full steam ahead for Reena's planned residence for developmentally disabled adults over 55 – the first of its kind in Canada.

Reena's building arm, Batay Reena, has bought a site on Crestwood Avenue in Thornhill, near Bathurst and Steeles. Fundraising campaign chair Alex Eisen has helped raise $1.5 million so far for the project.

The organization is applying for a building permit, followed by tenders being issued.

The Al and Faye Mintz Elder Home, named for the longtime Reena supporters, will be a fully kosher, three-storey residence especially for older adults. Up to 16 Reena clients 55 and over will live there.

Today, about a third of Reena's 500 clients are over 50, a ratio that's expected to rise to half in the next six years, says Sandy Keshen, the organization's executive director.

And the developmentally disabled often show signs of aging while still in their 50s, she notes, adding they are not candidates for mainstream facilities like Baycrest.

Many developmentally disabled adults still live with their aging parents. Keshen says Reena regularly fields calls from the parents about what will happen to their children once they are gone.

"The major issue is their quality of life. [The residence] will allow older adults a sense of purpose and dignity, where they can live out their lives."

Plans for the 9,000-square-foot home call for private and semi-private bedrooms, a communal living area, garden, kitchen and leisure space. Residents would attend day programs at Reena's Battle Centre, about 10 minutes away by car.

About half of Reena's clients live in residences. Keshen says the elder home will free other resources and ease the organization's waiting list, now at about 250.

Steeles Memorial Chapel, a Reena supporter, is honoring Wilfred and Mildred Kideckel, also Reena boosters, at a tribute dinner and cantorial concert on Nov. 11 at Beth Emeth Synagogue.

Proceeds from the affair will go toward the Reena elder home.

For details, call 905-763-8254, ext. 3034.

A collaboration between Reena and Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has yielded the Jewish Community Action Group, whose mandate is to help change attitudes toward the developmentally disabled.

The group, whose members include representatives from both organizations and two rabbis, is examining ways in which communal leaders and institutions can be more inclusive of the Jewish developmentally disabled.

So far, the group has discussed the possibility of "inclusion representatives" at synagogues, as well as promoting the participation of the developmentally disabled in groups for youth, women and young adults.

For more information, call Ruth Slater at 905-889-2690.

Pulver was honorary VP of Hadassah-WIZO

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Carole Pulver, honorary vice-president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, died recently after a long battle with bone marrow cancer.

Pulver, born in Peterborough, was a lifelong member of the organization and "will long be remembered for her spontaneity of thought, creativity of idea and tireless support that resulted in things happening," said Ellen Smiley, editor of Orah magazine and national treasurer, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

Obituary

Pulver, who lived in Peterborough until two years ago, was instrumental in developing the St. Joseph's Hospital Foundation, the fundraising arm of the Peterborough hospital.

"Carole took pride and derived much pleasure in her community, and was often at the forefront, trying to make a difference in areas that would further the quality of life for people," said Smiley.

As a third generation life member of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, Pulver held a variety of positions, including chair of healthcare services, general secretary and vice-president.

"Her strength, however, lay in the understanding of Jewish life in a small community. In Peterborough, Carole rallied round the small group of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO women, encouraging them in their work for Israel and providing them with stability," said Smiley.

Lily Frank, national executive vice-president, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, called Pulver "an extraordinary volunteer... who had a genuine and deep love for our work in Israel, particularly for Assaf Harofeh Hospital, which is supported by our organization.

"She had a special way to harmonize situations. People depended on her. Her death leaves a huge vacuum in our organization and in the general Peterborough community.

Pulver is survived by her husband Sigmund (Skipper), son Fred in Jerusalem; Paul in Vancouver; and son and daughter-in-law Doug and Lana in Vancouver. She also leaves her grandson Benjamin, her parents Myer and Adeline Levine and brother Ron Levine, all of Peterborough.

For another obituary, please see page 16.

IT'S YOUR CALL...

This winter in Toronto, 4,000 Jewish children will be living below the poverty line. One of the only ways they can cope is through UJA Federation funded assistance. Without community financial support, this program and others would be in peril. Unfortunately, these children are among many Jews in need. Thousands of young people are completely detached from Jewish life and more than a million remain in the former Soviet Union, plagued by uncertainty and insecurity. Starting this coming Sunday, November 15, dedicated community volunteers will be contacting you on behalf of our historic Campaign for Fifty to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews in danger. Hundreds of thousands are depending on your positive response. Now, it's your call.

NDP defends its candidate

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The NDP's candidate in York West for the next provincial election was defended by party leader Howard Hampton at the recent executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Stephanie Payne, who was acclaimed as candidate, made controversial remarks about Jews during the threatened boycott of Show Boat in 1993. Payne, who was then a school trustee, said it was usually Jews who produced derogatory plays or films about blacks. She later apologized, but said her remark was not anti-Semitic.

"I've talked to Payne, and she told me she harbors no prejudice against Jews, and will never repeat what she said at that time," Hampton said.

Congress delegate Jack Jacobson said he was not impressed by Payne's apology. "It shows some lack of integrity on the part of the NDP to choose her," he said. "I've always voted CCF or NDP, but I don't know whether I will this time."

On other issues, Payne is a good candidate, Hampton said, and she has agreed to operate within the boundaries set by the party.

Hampton is the first of the three Ontario party leaders to speak to the executive.

On another matter, the NDP leader said he is opposed to government support for Jewish day schools, adding: "I will be blunt and tell you we disagree on this issue."

But "if you say yes to Catholics and no to Jews, you don't believe in equality," Congress official David Rotenberg charged.

Referring to changes made by Premier Mike Harris, Hampton said most of the middle class will not benefit from the income tax cuts introduced by the Harris government.

He said it was the moral responsibility of the provincial government to redistribute the $1.5 billion in income tax cuts to the health system and education.

The middle class will find any income tax savings more than eaten up by fees for services which are now free and for increased university tuition fees, he said.

"It is fundamentally wrong to be cutting education and hospitals to fund an income tax reduction," Hampton said.

He said he was "deeply disturbed" over the provincial government's decision to remove material about hate propaganda and racist issues from the curriculum of high schools.

The NDP leader was thanked by chair Keith Landy for supporting the Holocaust Memorial Day bill now before the legislature.

In other business, Neil Sher, special assistant to the Canadian war crimes unit, told the executive that a "sea change" has taken place in the federal government's attitude to prosecuting war criminals.

The Ottawa war crimes unit is now filing cases against suspected war criminals at a faster rate than its counterpart in the United States, said Sher.

"We expect an increase in the number of cases, but my advice to you is to be vigilant and keep this issue on the front burner. The window of opportunity is closing a little each day."

Sher said the relationship between the war crimes unit and the Canadian Jewish community is good.

"The difficulties are obvious, there will be frustrations, and it is fantasyland to expect all criminals to be brought to justice," he said.

New education director at JRCC

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Levi Jacobson would rather light a fire than put on a coat.

As the recently appointed, and first director of the Centre for Judaic Studies at Toronto's Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), the rabbi says he's acting on a principle he learned from the late Lubavitcher Rebbe.

"The Rebbe used to say that either you can put on a fur coat to warm yourself, while everyone else freezes, or you could build a fire," says Rabbi Jacobson, who studied under Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson in New York. "We are building fires."

Rabbi Jacobson hopes to warm the spirits of Toronto's growing Russian Jewish population, estimated at 35,000, with dozens of adult education programs he's developing.

The 25-year-old rabbi comes to town from venues a bit more exotic than Toronto. He's fresh from running adult Jewish education and outreach programs in Sweden, Finland, Alaska, Greece and Shanghai – testament to Lubavitch's global reach.

Working under JRCC director Rabbi Joseph Zaltzman, Rabbi Jacobson has already attracted attention with a full autumn semester of courses, lasting until the end of December. These include weekly classes on Talmud, Torah study, Jewish law, beginner's Hebrew, and mysticism. There are also special events and guest lectures.

Rabbi Levi Jacobson

The classes, held at the JRCC on Rockford Road, require no background or previous knowledge. They are mostly free and open to men and women. Some are in Russian, but most are taught in English.

Although thousands of ex-Soviet and Russian immigrants have come to Toronto with little or no affinity to things Jewish – religion and especially Judaism having been suppressed in their native land for so long – Rabbi Jacobson is finding a market for his product.

"There is a thirst for knowledge. [In Russia] people felt Judaism in their flesh and blood. They tell me it was a curse because being Jewish was a stamp on your passport. Now they tell me it's something beautiful."

Rabbi Jacobson says response to the classes has been "excellent. People are asking me all kinds of questions. They want more programs. My hands are full."

For details, call the JRCC at 222-7105.

Cummer Lodge raises $10,000 for new equipment

TORONTO — A total of $10,000 has already been raised for audio equipment for hearing-impaired residents of Cummer Lodge.

This was raised at a special event Oct. 23 sponsored by the Knights of Columbus, where a cheque for that amount was handed to the lodge by Grand Knight Bob Gasparic.

A benefit concert Jan. 9, 1999, at the Ford Centre for The Performing Arts, sponsored by North York Knights of Columbus, will also provide funds for audio and rehabilitation therapy equipment.

The first event was a kickoff for the Night of Knights regular subscription concert by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, featuring students from the University of Toronto Opera School. It will be held in the George Weston Concert Hall of the Ford Centre.

The audio equipment will enable residents to take part in services in the multi-faith chapel at Cummer Lodge.

Cummer Lodge, a Toronto Home for the Aged, is now undergoing major renovations.

HOT takes aim at developing young leaders

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Last week, we examined how leaders are made, not born. Today, we will look at efforts to recruit young people, and look at some graduates of the UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program.

TORONTO — While most of the Leadership Development Program (LDP) candidates are in the 28 to 40 age range, there is another young leadership program that aims at those even younger.

One of its successes is the Hands On Toronto (HOT) component. HOT gets young people directly involved in volunteer work — everything from fundraising to program planning, said Elana Carr, who runs the program.

Some participants may volunteer to serve as Big Brothers or Big Sisters at JF&CS, others may design Purim or Passover events at nursing homes. About 75 young people are currently participating in the year-old program. "We know when people get involved, they buy into the cause," Carr said.

UJA Federation staffer Avi Benlolo believes developing leadership is key to the future health of the community. "What's going to happen in a few years when the older generation of leaders retires? That's a question we ask all the time. It's part of why young leadership was created. It was created to renew the community."

Ottawa-native Les Aaron serves as co-chair of the UJA Federation's young leadership division, the "future machers," he calls them.

People who are trained at a fairly young age and work at the grass roots level will eventually rise to take important positions in the community, he believes.

Young leaders are mentored and shown the ropes, including the UJA's fundraising element and community outreach. By combining those elements, volunteers can see how the money that is raised goes to help people in need, he said.

Gets young people involved in volunteer work

Aaron, who credits his parents with instilling a volunteer ethos in him, said that "when people reach a certain point in their career, they want to be involved with a large group, to do good work and get personal benefits."

Gloria Clamen, 1991 recipient of the UJA Federation Leadership Development Award, said she's been a volunteer since she was 12 years old. "As I've gotten older, I've been continually interested in volunteering, as it gives me the opportunity to express myself in many ways, to give back to the community...I also feel it's important for the continuity of the community. It allows people to express their Judaic affiliations in a non-religious way."

Clamen, past president of the Toronto Council of Jewish Women International, is currently serving as president of Circle of Care. Though the government-funded agency serves both Jews and non-Jews, Clamen said "my involvement in the Jewish community has brought a Jewish perspective to the board."

That translates into more information for the staff on developments in the Jewish community with particular regard to raising funds, creating partnerships to save money on resources and undertaking joint lobbying efforts for increased government support.

Judy and David Engel, a husband and wife team who both graduated from the LDP, have become key fixtures at United Synagogue Day School on Bayview. Judy is president of the parents association while David is vice-president of the board and a member of the executive. Judy has served as chair of the UJA's Women's Campaign while David has served as co-chair of the overall campaign.

Natives of Montreal, they grew up in a milieu where "it's part of our tradition to be doing [charitable work]," Judy Engel said.

Eager to create a Jewish lifestyle for themselves in Toronto, they felt that strengthening the community would create a lasting legacy for their children, she said.

They chose the federation because they believed maintaining a strong, central fundraising organization was important to avoid duplication, and to allocate funds in a fair manner.

Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, has worked in four other Jewish communities around the world, from Australia to Boston. He points out that despite the popularity of the LDP, more recruits are still needed.

While there are many volunteers in Toronto, "there aren't enough people to go around," he stated. "There's a low level of community participation" in Toronto compared to both Australia and Boston. "Here the same people are being draw upon" while in Sydney, "it seemed to be, pro rata, a greater sense of involvement across the board, a greater level of volunteerism. In Boston, I felt the same thing.

"I feel that volunteering does not necessarily have the cachet it had in the past and people don't feel a need to take responsibility. I think the Federation tries. It makes a real effort to build a cadre of leaders."

But he questioned whether the focus on "leadership" might not be turning off potential volunteers, who see it as too elitist.

"Perhaps we should not talk about leadership and instead talk about workers, volunteers. Those terms wouldn't turn people away or intimidate them.

"People don't see themselves as leaders but they might be happy to be a volunteer.

"I think the Federation does a great job, but I think there are other issues at play."

They try again

Islamic Jihad and Hamas rushed to claim credit for the attempted slaughter of as many pre-Shabbat shoppers as possible in the open air market of Machane Yehuda last Friday in Jerusalem. But whether by a miracle of God or by the bungling of the butchers, or both, Israel was spared yet another nightmare of mourning. The bombs did explode, wounding more than 20 passers-by, but they killed only the two men who had brought them.

These contemptible fanatics stoop ever lower. Last week, they aimed their murderous intent at the shoppers in Machane Yehuda. Three weeks ago, they targeted a busload of schoolchildren in Gush Katif. Moreover, there is no reason to believe they will stop. Indeed, as reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians inches closer, we know they will increase their attacks.

Their aim is to bring about the end of any possibility of peace between Israelis and Palestinians. Their method is to inflict mayhem and suffering on the people of Israel.

The government of Israel, however, refuses to let the fanatics achieve their aim. It is determined to find a path to peace. Thus, although it temporarily suspended the deliberations over the Wye accord, it did not abandon them. Nor will it abandon them unless it believes that Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA) are indifferent to the attacks or, worse, somehow complicit in them. But Arafat is now a target of Hamas and Islamic Jihad also. They want him dead too, have said so publicly, and will do their best to see it done.

If we accept at face value the declarations about peace that Arafat made before the world at the Wye summit and the recommitments to peace he signed there, then Hamas and Islamic Jihad are no less his enemies than they are Israel's. He must therefore act accordingly and demonstrate his resolve to protect the peace process. That means he must strike at Hamas and Islamic Jihad at every turn and uproot them from the soil of Palestinian nationalism.

He must tell his people and, more importantly, show them that he stands unequivocally for peace with Israel, that the possibility of a better future lies only through accommodation with Israel rather than through conflict.

The nations of the world who wish for peace between Israelis and Palestinians, Canada included, must reinforce this important message to Arafat. They must also demonstrably stand alongside Israel and the PA in their struggle against Hamas and Islamic Jihad by reinforcing the flip side of that message to the extremist, violent fanatics that terror will never be tolerated.

Poignant red poppy

The Jewish people, perhaps more than most, understands the metaphysical gravity of memory. Memory that traverses time, that spans generations, is more than merely recalling something to mind, more than a momentary mental notation, more than simply not forgetting.

It is an imprint pressed deeply into the soul of a child. It helps to define the adult that the child is destined to become and the community to which he or she will belong.

All such memories have their symbols. When caught by the corner of the eye or contemplated in the silent recess of one's heart, they usually summon forth familiar images of that first memory.

The poignant red poppy is one of those symbols.

Small, floral, its jarring scarlet boldness evokes almost a century of memories embedded forever, through the travail of tears, into our western way of life.

Those memories are of grieving for the thousands of Canadian servicemen and women who died fighting in our wars.

Nov. 11 was Remembrance Day. When we saw the poppy, we remembered them, for their memories have surely been for blessing.

20,000 Canadian Jews deserve homage on Nov. 11

Your Oct. 19 article "1948 War Vets To Be Honored" properly pays tribute to those young Canadians of the Machal whose Zionist commitment was matched by their readiness to shed their blood for a cause most Jews believed in deeply. Most were prepared to contribute monetarily but these men made by far the most selfless and meaningful contribution, men like Joe Warner, and the legendary Major Ben Dunkelman. Men who believed on two occasions, that if one didn't have principles – people and even countries so precious to them that they were worth dying for – their lives were without meaning. Their names must be revered for generations to come.

It is at this time of remembrance that we Jews must never forget those close to 20,000 young Canadian Jews who enlisted, and the hundreds who died, to defeat Hitler and his Nazi Germany. These were the true liberators without whom we would not have our treasured survivors. Because of them, and all who fought so nobly and successfully, our community, its synagogues, institutions and media should also join in our national day of remembrance, Nov. 11, which is too often unobserved by a community who should enshrine their names with pride and gratitude.

Israel didn't gain most in peace deal

After 50 years, the State of Israel is sharing, under the interim peace agreement, an area the size of an elongated postage stamp, with its former nemesis.

Consider the narrowness of the country and the danger of attacks carried by anti-Israeli militants from the West Bank and Gaza. When the local media, in their prejudicial enlightenment, can print in boldface types "Israel Comes Out Ahead" and "Israelis Gain Most" in the mideast interim peace accord, how can anyone consider the breakthrough as Israel's preferential deal!

Now parliamentary headliners in the Knesset and right-wing supporters solidly backed with disillusioned settlers are stirring up dangerous nationalistic sentiments and demands against the peace process.

Plagued with internal violence, Israelis are at a difficult impasse with themselves, but they must now be prepared to accept their closeness with the Palestinians in a friendlier and safer environment across international borders.

All the Israelis aspire to a secured and peaceful region, free from bombs and the spreading of vicious propaganda. Let's hope they can finally succeed!

Reviewer had the Singer brothers mixed

Re: Review of Vagabond Stars (CJN, Oct. 29).

Someone should inform the editors of Nahma Sandrow or the University of Syracuse Press or Sheldon Kirshner that Yoshe Kalb was written not by Isaac Bashevis Singer but by I.J. Singer, his older brother.

The reviewer seems quite miffed that Toronto is not mentioned in the book. Why should it be? What major performer hailed from here? It does have a small claim to fame; it is the only city where a new building was constructed for the sole purpose of housing the Yiddish theatre – the Standard Theatre which lasted until the depression struck.

Health workers add to problem of aged

Re: "Our ageist society" by Rabbi Gunther Plaut (CJN, Sept. 17), calls attention to a serious problem of bias and discrimination. I would like to add that many members of the helping professions compound the problem.

How often do we hear nurses, social workers, physicians, psychologists, use such expressions as "the burden of your aging parents" and "you are the sandwich generation being squeezed." Framing the caring of one's parents in such negative language takes away their dignity, and places older people in a category of "the problem."

Letter to a Palestinian friend

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

I thought about you after the terrorist attack in Gush Katif in which we lost a soldier, and were spared the deaths of school children. I remembered your courage in coming to the funeral of an Israeli who had been murdered by Hamas. And I know that in your heart you have but one big wish: to put an end to the murder and the bloodletting.

But I thought to myself what would happen to you and me, your people and mine, if God forbid, the Hamas murderers had succeeded, and the broken bodies of our children were strewn before us in that intersection?

After all, everyone knows that the fate of this peace process, which began in Oslo, still hangs by a thread. Hamas can rip it apart at any moment. Hamas and the Islamic Jihad are a powerful factor. They "vote" in the Israeli elections; they brought the downfall of the Labor-Meretz government.

Although it has already been said many times before, the truth is that without a fight to the finish against terrorism and its infrastructure – a consistent war that does not wax or wane with the seasons or the governments – peace between the two peoples is impossible.

No government would be able to survive, should you attempt to disregard this simple fact. But that's not why I'm writing to you. The issue runs much deeper than that. The time has come for the Palestinian leadership and educated classes – yes, now – to consider Israel, its peace-seeking residents and the permanent settlement.

The prime minister made a decision that was painful and difficult for him; much more difficult for him than for us. He had to abandon an idea on which he was raised from earliest childhood, that the entire greater land of Israel exclusively belongs to the Jewish people.

True, this difficulty also exists among you and your friends. You were raised to believe in a greater Palestine, and you clung to that idea even when the idea was wholly implausible.

It isn't easy for Arafat to listen to the condemnations of the rejectionist Arab camp and the curses of Ali Hamani and Hassan Nasrallah, just as it isn't easy for [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu to hear yesterday's allies threatening him with electoral ostracism.

But the symmetry ends there. There is a large majority in Israel, spearheaded by the intelligentsia, which is prepared to pay a heavy price for peace with the Palestinians and the Arab world.

Most of the Israeli media supports Palestinian issues, stressing their distressful condition and welcoming anything that looks or feels like a step in the direction of peace. If only we could see a similar situation on the other side.

If only people like you would raise their voices in courage. How can educated people not join us in common struggle? How is it that your voice is silenced, in the best case, or joins the chorus of the rejectionists, in the worst – and more prevalent – case?

How can the Egyptian intelligentsia become the mouthpiece for extremist rejectionism?

How can anyone give an interview, as Hanan Ashrawi did to the BBC, without expressing even the slightest word of praise for what the Likud government did? Or without even mentioning, even in passing, the immense public support in Israel – 75 percent – for the Wye Agreement? We hear Ahmed Tibi, another friend, stating that "we will not be satisfied with anything less than a Palestinian state in the '67 borders."

One hundred percent sovereignty, he says, will give one hundred percent security to Israel .

I do not believe there is, or will be, a government in Israel that would agree to this plan, to which [I] would also be opposed. There is no way to base a permanent settlement on this plan, and Dr. Tibi knows that.

The Beilin-Abu Mazen agreement indicated that there is readiness among the Palestinians for compromise. But on what basis can we determine that one hundred percent Palestinian sovereignty will give us one hundred percent security? Where are there any signs to prove that?

We are on the brink of fateful decisions that will affect the two peoples and the entire Middle East. The courage of Yitzhak Rabin and his government paved the path out of perpetual war. Most of the public has been persuaded to take this path. The Likud and its leader have abandoned the route heading in the other direction.

These are historic times that need the leaders and educated class on the other side. The chance for peace also depends on you; by what you do and what you don't do, by what you say and what you don't say.

Hamas tried again. A car bomb exploded in Machane Yehuda in Jerusalem last week before Shabbat. The two bombers were killed but more than 20 people were injured. Please see our coverage elsewhere in the paper.

Opinions

The battle for the centre

The most significant element in the Wye agreement is not contained in the many clauses of the written document, but rather in its impact on Israeli politics, and specifically, in Benjamin Netanyahu's divorce from the ideological right. The split between the ideological and the political right is now clear, and its implications are far-reaching and long-term.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Wye occurred against the backdrop of an already discernable trend, which has been described as a "centrization" of the Israeli political map. Five years of dialogue with the PLO – as difficult as it may be – have blunted the edges on both left and right. Over this period of time, the division between left and right on the peace issue has become less acute, and a majority of Israelis has remained supportive of the peace process throughout.

While in 1996, the right and the centre elected Netanyahu, his coalition has been dependent on the nationalist National Religious Party and the ultra-Orthodox – but more politically moderate – Shas. This has given the opponents of Oslo a pivotal position in the government and Knesset, and has made Netanyahu vulnerable to their threat to topple his government.

Recently, however, through the Wye agreement, Netanyahu's acquiescence to the inevitability of the process – as reluctant as it may be – has marginalized the opposition to the process from the right. The agreement is supported by close to 80 percent of the Israeli public, and 105 out of 120 Knesset members. Along with other significant players in Israeli politics, like Labor leader Ehud Barak, outgoing Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo, and Likud MK Dan Meridor, Netanyahu is now playing to the Israeli centre. That is the new, critical battlefield in the country's politics.

Last week's memorial services marking the third anniversary of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination reflected this trend. Labor and "peace" leaders have traditionally addressed the public assembly commemorating the event. This year, two of the speakers were Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, a key figure in the Netanyahu cabinet and a supporter of the Oslo process, and former foreign affairs minister David Levy, who had supported the process while in the Netanyahu government.

Back in the Knesset, the political turmoil continues. The open question is whether Netanyahu will seek early elections to protect himself from the stranglehold threatened by the right. By appealing to the people in the next 69 days, he can take advantage of the goodwill in the centre, and Labor's "security blanket" in the Knesset. However, to do so on his own, he requires the agreement of President Ezer Weizman, who is not a fan of the prime minister.

In the meantime, a bill calling for a Knesset vote for early elections, first sponsored by Labor MKs a few months ago, is slowly making its way through the legislative process. Ironically, in the wake of Wye, it is now supported by some of the agreement's opponents on the right, who want to challenge Netanyahu in the polls. At the same time, a number of Arab MKs, who had earlier supported the bill, are now arguing that Netanyahu deserves a chance to deliver on Wye.

Two other initiatives are complicating the situation even further. A private member's bill calling for a return to the old, single-vote system by which the Knesset votes the leader of the largest party as prime minister, rather than the direct election system that brought Netanyahu to power, is also in the mix. In addition, there is a move to raise the threshold of representation in the Knesset from 1.5 percent of the popular vote to a higher number.

Both of these stem from a concern that the next Knesset will be even more fragmented than the current one, thereby exacerbating the "sectorization" of Israeli politics. If the existing system remains in place, Labor and Likud are unlikely to get more than 45 seats altogether in the next election. (Two votes have allowed voters to vote for a prime ministerial candidate, and then give their Knesset vote to a party of their choice. As a result, the traditionally smaller parties gained significant strength in the last election.)

If it all seems extremely confusing, that's because it is. Most political observers say that Israeli politics have never been as fluid and unpredictable. The uncertainty reflects a deeper process of realignment that is shifting the sands and has not yet created the landscape of new politics for the next decade. The old divide between Labor and Likud is no longer relevant, and the mainstreams of the two parties have more in common in policies, if not in political culture, than what divides them. That is why the centre is the arena to observe in the coming months and years.

From public to private Judaism

Jewish identity has for some time been conceived in linear terms, with clearly defined poles that distinguish "greater" from "lesser" levels.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

We can allegedly measure it, and more is better than less. This has certainly been the guiding assumption of most quantitative social scientific research on Jewish identity in North America. It also underlies much of the thinking about the continuity crisis facing contemporary Jewry.

American professors Steven Cohen and Arnold Eisen have completed a small scale study which serves to challenge those assumptions. Their work, sponsored by the Wilstein Institute, is based on roughly 50 in-depth interviews with "moderately affiliated" American Jews. These were Jews who were not assimilated, mainly Reform and Conservative, had a range of Jewish backgrounds, and in general identified positively with being Jewish. As often happens with qualitative research, the study yields conclusions that differ from those of large scale survey research.

The central finding of Cohen and Eisen is that the meaning of Jewishness has shifted from the public to the private realm. In some ways, this reinforces a dominant trait of liberal individualism within American society. These Jews were finding their own paths to and definitions of a meaningful Jewish identity, but in a way that did not yield a linear journey. They did not want to conform to pre-set limits and boundaries. This same tendency has been noted in recent studies of American religion generally.

From the study, it is difficult to generalize about causal factors which promote identity. Indeed, the blurring of the subjective and objective leads to an almost post-modern conception of Judaism. Jewishness is what they felt it to be. Is any of this new? Jews recall the saying that "every Jew makes their own Sabbath." (Yet at least there was a consensus on the need to make a Sabbath…)

Cohen and Eisen list several "obstacles to involvement" that their subjects recounted. The list negates every previous study of Jewish identity. The negative influences are parents; Hebrew school; rabbis and congregations; UJA, federations, and Jewish organizations; and Israel. The respondents reported on various biographical episodes in which these factors may have turned them off at some point from Jewish life – though obviously not fully, since they remained committed Jews.

What is going on here? Take the issue of Jewish education. Every study has found that more Jewish education is associated with higher measures of subsequent Jewish identity, though the precise nature of the relationship can vary.

Yet the authors report that "Hebrew school was consistently named, even by high end respondents, as a negative feature of their childhood experience."

How can both be true? Simple. The qualitative and quantitative findings are not contradictory. I propose the "spinach theory" as an explanation. Most people might have negative childhood memories of being forced to eat spinach, along with other fruits or vegetables, when they preferred candy. But years later, those who had eaten the better diet might well be objectively healthier as adults.

The challenge facing Jewish planners and formal and informal educators is to come up with a delicious spinach candy.

Or consider that one of the respondents' "stimuli" to Jewish involvement is dating and breaking up with a non-Jew. Yet surveys have found that dating non-Jews is highly correlated with mixed marriage and assimilation. Again, both may be true. Cohen and Eisen did not interview Jews who dated and then married non-Jews.

But leaving aside methodological issues, their interviews do raise a difficult question. If it is true that Jews will increasingly seek fulfilment within their private spheres and in their families, what does this mean for the profoundly communal and organizational character of Jewish life? It is no accident that Jews need a minyan in order to pray. Even the pluralism which many of us value within the Jewish experience has usually been associated with corresponding organizations and social movements of substantial size.

Canadian Jews as yet do not share the same degree of detachment from their formal organizations as do Americans. But a trend towards ever smaller units of Jewish life – if it materializes – will pose challenges for future notions of Jewish community.

More on Josef Burg

A Torontonian, Frederick Rose, who is a regular reader of The Canadian News and often comments on my columns, wrote me the following concerning a recent article on Josef Burg. (Burg was for many years a member, not only of the Knesset, but also of the Israeli government under a variety of prime ministers, and was truly a survivor until he voluntarily retired from politics. His son, Avraham, is the head of the Jewish Agency.)

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Rose remembers Josef Burg from his school days in Leipzig, where Burg was his teacher, and comments: "I am probably his only surviving pupil in Toronto."

He made available to me an address that Burg gave in Berlin some three years ago on the occasion of VE Day – the end of World War II in Europe, in 1945.

Burg talked first about Israel and its endangered situation: "We choose to live now in the shadow of an ABC-War. A stands for atom bombs, B for bacteriological warfare, and C for chemical attack, but we Jews had already had an ABC experience: A for Auschwitz, B for Birkenau, Bergen-Belsen and Buchenwald, and C for Chelmno, all the way to W for Westerburg and Z for Ziklongas [German for cyclon gas]." After a review of Jewish life in Germany, he turned to the necessity for Jews and Germans to come together rather than stay apart, and quoted German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, who said: "Let us build bridges for the future."

Burg continued: "This new dialogue is possible through mutual understanding. We should think and feel together, as Goethe said in 1807: "Germans, like Jews, may be oppressed from time to time, but they cannot be extinguished. They will not lose their courage and remain strong even if it were their fate not to have a homeland." (This remarkable saying by the German poet referred to the fact that, in 1807, the existence of Germany itself was in danger of being shattered by the French, and of course the Jews had not yet been threatened by a holocaust.)

Burg closed his address in the following manner: "About half of all Jews in the world live today in Israel. We are free citizens in a true democracy on our historic soil. The new Israel can, may and must take up the dialogue with Germany once again. The horrors of the past must not suppress the hope for the future. Let us take as an example the ner tamid, the eternal light, that in every synagogue reminds us of the Temple in Jerusalem. The ner tamid which had been placed in 1866 in the 'New Synagogue' [which has since been partially rebuilt by the city of Berlin] had been found in 1989 in the synagogue's ruins.

"That light displaced darkness – may this be the motto for this place and may we remember what the first chief rabbi of Israel once said: 'The old may renew itself and may the new become sanctified.'" (He referred to Rabbi Abraham Kook.)

It is my hope that Burg will someday soon return to Canada. We can all learn, not only from his rich background, but also from his compassion, intelligence and all-encompassing tolerance.

The Kirshner File

Jewish philosopher, literary critic fascinates Germans

Virtually unknown outside Germany when he died in 1940, Walter Benjamin is a cult figure today. A philosopher and a literary critic, his interests ranged far and wide.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Whether he was writing on German drama, French literature, art history or modern film, Benjamin brought to bear on his essays a rigor of intellect and a depth of knowledge.

Like many German Jews whose lives were shattered by Nazism, Benjamin has been claimed by Germany as one of its own. In July 1992, Germany marked the hundredth anniversary of his birth with an abundance of events running the gamut from scholarly congresses to radio and television programs.

The fascination with Benjamin remains unabated. Last month, in Toronto, the Goethe-Institut, an organization dedicated to promoting German culture and language, sponsored a two-day symposium on Benjamin.

There was a metaphorical Spanish film about his last tragic days entitled The Last Frontier, a stylized documentary by Manuel Cusso-Ferrer which established his position at the intersection of various scholarly disciplines and literary forms.

There was a talk by Michael Jennings, a Princeton University professor of Germanic languages and literature who introduced a new, three-volume English edition of his writings called Walter Benjamin, Collected Works (Harvard University Press). Jennings, the general editor, spoke of the difficulties in translating Benjamin's imagistic style into English, noting that previous translations had been erratic.

There was a photographic exhibition both documenting his life and depicting the memorial to him created by Israeli artist Dani Karavan in Port Bou, Spain. The exhibition, which ends on Dec. 12, shows the sombre Benjamin from boyhood to adulthood.

There was, finally, a conference in which several speakers, experts in their respective fields, reflected upon his contributions. Among them were Dieter Hassenpflug of Bauhaus University in Weimar and Rebecca Comay of the University of Toronto.

Benjamin, whose fate was a paradigm of the persecution of Jews by Germany, was born in Berlin, the son of a wealthy art dealer. He studied in Berlin, Munich and Bern. Upon the completion of his formal studies in 1920, he returned to Germany. Until 1933, when he finally emigrated, Benjamin wrote mainly for the Frankfurter Zeitung and the Literarische Welt. His declared intention was "to be recognized as the most important German literary critic."

After Adolf Hitler's appointment as chancellor, Benjamin considered the idea of going to Palestine. His friend, Gershom Scholem, a librarian at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, promised to try to find him a job there as a lecturer in Jewish mysticism if he learned Hebrew.

Benjamin, though a Marxist, was intensely Jewish. But he was definitely not a Zionist.

Settling in Paris, he resumed his activity as a translator of Proust and Baudelaire. And under the pseudonyms of Detlef Holz and K.A. Stempflinger, he continued publishing articles in the Frankfurter Zeitung.

In June 1940, with France occupied by the German army, Benjamin caught the last train leaving Paris. From Lourdes, he travelled to Marseilles. From there, he joined a group of German-Jewish refugees bound for neutral territory in Port Bou, Spain. Much to his horror, the official stamp that would have legalized his departure from Vichy France was withheld from him. In a fit of despair, he committed suicide in Port Bou.

The body was interred in a local cemetery, but when the five-year-lease bought by a friend expired, his remains were placed in a common grave. The contrast between his ignominious death and his present fame is nothing less than astonishing.

The scent of fascism

L'Oreal, with annual sales of seven billion dollars (US), is the world's largest cosmetics company. Besides its own products, it owns such famous trademarks as Lancome, Lanvin, Guy Laroche, Georgio Armani and Ralph Lauren.

As a matter of course, firms like L'Oreal spend untold millions buffing their corporate image. But nine years ago, L'Oreal, based in France, found itself embroiled in an international scandal which irretrievably tarnished its name. The scandal turned on L'Oreal's compliance with the Arab economic boycott of Israel and the Nazi past of two of its principals.

As Michael Bar-Zohar states in Bitter Scent (Dutton), the genesis of the affair goes back to a board of directors meeting in 1989, during which one of its members, Jean Frydman, a Jew with close connections to Israel,was shocked to learn that he was being asked to resign.

Frydman, who had an interest in a Helena Rubinstein plant in Israel, refused. Several days later, he discovered that the board had announced his resignation at a meeting that had never even taken place. Frydman was told that his ouster had been engineered by Jacques Correze, the president of L'Oreal's affiliate in New York and the person responsible for its negotiations with the Arab Boycott Bureau in Damascus.

Never having heard of Correze, Frydman set out to learn about him. In investigating his background, Frydman, a Polish Jew whose family had settled in France in 1938, stumbled upon information about L'Oreal's founder, Eugene Schueller, which made his skin crawl. Bitter Scent, which often reads like a thriller, reveals the sordid details.

Schueller, a Parisian of Alsatian origins, invented a hair dye in 1910 which he dubbed L'Oreal. As his fortune grew, he turned reactionary and anti-Semitic. He was drawn to far-right extremist circles, including La Cagoule, which plotted against the government and carried out political assassinations in the 1930s.

When France was conquered by Germany in 1940, La Cagoule broke into three groups. The first swore allegiance to Charles de Gaulle's government-in-exile in London. The second sided with the Vichy regime. The third collaborated directly with the Germans.

Correze was a member of that fanatical faction. Its platform called for "the exclusion of the Jews from the life and the economy of France..." In September 1941, Correze went one step further and joined the Wehrmacht as a volunteer.

Following the war, Correze was arrested and imprisoned. In 1950, after serving only two years, he was released. Shortly afterward, Schueller gave him a job at L'Oreal. Correze rose in the ranks, and became good friends with Helena Rubinstein, from whom he concealed his past. L'Oreal eventually bought her company, and Correze was appointed its president.

When the Arab League, in 1989, decided to boycott L'Oreal over its ties with Helena Rubinstein, Correze took charge of the file. Bar-Zohar, an Israeli writer who was once a member of the Knesset, describes at length the convoluted talks between L'Oreal and the Arab Boycott Bureau.

The plot thickened in 1990 when Frydman, a resident of Israel since 1981, sued L'Oreal. Subsequently, several French Jewish organizations filed class action suits against L'Oreal for violating France's anti-boycott laws, enacted in 1981 under the administration of President Francois Mitterrand (who had a long and enduring friendship with Francois Dalle, L'Oreal's president).

The story, competently told by Bar-Zohar, does not end there. Indeed, the denouement is more surprising than one might assume.

The truth of existence

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

I once saw an interviewer ask Woody Allen, "What do you have faith in?" He paused, and then said, "I have faith in the power of distraction." Nor is he alone.

Our culture's frantic search for amusement reflects an intense need to avoid coming to terms with our uncomfortable suspicion that nothing really adds up, that life may in the end be "lost" or "trivial" or "random." We'd rather not gaze at that picture – who would? – but we're also unsure and unclear about how and where to search for meaning. Distraction is what is left us, a twilight zone in between emptiness and the search for spiritual authenticity.

With this in mind, I introduced my students to a fantasy constructed by the American philosopher, Robert Nozick, called The Experience Machine. What if a person could preprogram their life before entering a kind of tank? Inside the tank they would then experience whatever they wanted with whomever they wanted – swashbuckling adventure, passionate romance, colorful travel. It would feel to the person as if it were totally real; they would not even be aware of the fact that they were enacting a complete illusion, spending their life within a machine.

This is more than simply an amusing philosophical diversion. The issue of whether a person prefers pleasant illusion to the often more complex and inevitably more painful fate of real life is one that arises repeatedly for all of us. For example, if you could have a marriage where your spouse continuously cheated on you, but you did not know and you were very happy otherwise, would you wish that illusion to carry on forever, or would you want to know the painful truth, even if it shattered your life?

This very question faces the narrator of Ford Madox Ford's novel, The Good Soldier, who finally discovers that for many years his wife has been having an adulterous affair with his best friend. The narrator's world is in tatters; the "happiness" that he has enjoyed for nearly a decade has come crashing down.

Here is his poignant question: "If for nine years I have possessed a goodly apple that is rotten at the core and discovered its rottenness only in nine years and six months less four days, isn't it true to say that for nine years I possessed a goodly apple?"

If we live a lie, but we are content within that lie, does it matter? Isn't that a good life?

Not quite. Although a number of my students were tempted by Nozick's experiment, almost no one wanted to be betrayed, regardless of the fact that I stipulated that they would be content in their ignorance. They overwhelmingly voted to "know the truth," despite the obvious feelings of loss and fragmentation that would ensue. Notwithstanding our all too easy capacity for illusion and our claims that we just want to be happy at all costs, there is still a strangely powerful instinct for truth in human beings. To live as if distraction is all that is required is to tacitly admit that life is something to be averted.

Judaism believes that we all have a responsibility to seek out – not necessarily to obtain – the truth of existence. When we are children, honesty comes a lot more naturally than it does in later years; it is part of the spiritual reawakening of adult life to return to truth as a way of discovering what it really means to be human and alive.

Women and the Torah

Books
Bernard Baskin

ReVisions, Seeing Torah Through a Feminist Lens. Rabbi Elyse Goldstein (Key Porter Books, $29.95)

Over the past two or three decades, Jewish women have made giant strides in achieving equality with men in synagogue and communal life.

In an increasing number of synagogues, women rabbis and cantors preside. Women are called to the Torah and are counted in the minyan. It is no novelty to have women chosen for high congregational positions, including president. The bat mitzvah ceremony is now well established and infant girls are welcomed by family and friends in a ritual modeled after the brit milah. Mahalot (women ritual circumcisers) now look for business and the Reform prayer books and Haggadah have been rendered gender free.

Is this enough? No, contends Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. She writes, "For my purposes, egalitarianism is not enough. Egalitarianism does not yet balance the predominance of male images, male perspectives, male views of the world... Egalitarianism does not insist upon women's voices as women being heard; women's perspectives as women being sought; women's experiences as women being recorded."

Do women interpret the text of the Torah differently from men? Yes, asserts the author. They ask different questions and bring different answers. And she brings her own female perceptions to familiar biblical accounts of Eve and the snake, the matriarchs and the women of the Exodus story.

The midrash teaches – although the author doesn't mention the idea – that the Torah was transmitted to women first; and that women did not participate in the worship of the golden calf or in the evil report of the 12 spies, sins that were to prevent the children of Israel from entering Eretz Yisrael.

The author suggests a special prayer and ritual for menstruation. "Menstrual blood is women's covenantal blood, just as brit milah, circumcision, is men's. Women indeed have a brit inscribed in their flesh as an everlasting covenant. Women's covenant of blood is not just once, at eight days, but every month. We are 'initiated' when we begin to bleed."

Another of the author's basic concerns is to visit the mikvah at the beginning of each month, "when the moon and the sea and women's cycles become one."

She writes: "I go to the mikvah each month, not so I may be 'kosher' for my husband – I'm no chicken product – but as a woman bidding farewell to a regular part of myself. I am a woman who needs some way to existentially experience and then bless special moments."

Based on her rabbinical experience she feels that the mikvah can be a helpful adjunct to the healing process for women who are undergoing severe life changes or who are suffering from psychological malaise.

A portion of this challenging work deals with the idea of the goddess, her place in primitive Judaism, and how she can be restored to the faith meaningfully for women in our time.

This idea is bound to meet with strong resistance. Rabbi Goldstein argues that although the notion of the goddess is tied to pagan worship, it "provides a welcome relief from dominant patriarchal images of mainstream Judaism."

Certainly, the idea of the God of Israel must be complex and multifaceted enough to include all the components that went into the making of human beings – male and female.

The "rediscovered" Shchinah is an authentic Jewish symbol of the female qualities of God that has been used by women through the generations in connection with prayer and ritual. It can be merged, she insists, with the old goddess imagery and a staunch monotheism in a new and fruitful synthesis.

Involved in a balancing act, she wonders, "How do we straddle the fence... with one foot in the feminist camp and one foot in the Jewish camp; one foot in modernity and the other foot in tradition."

ReVisions is rich, feisty, closely reasoned and deeply felt. It should be read with a mind receptive to challenging provocative and unexpected ideas.

Rabbinic Reflections

People of the book

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Amidst all the other earth shattering news that fills up newspapers and concerns the media, there always seems to be a story about the moment of the millennium.

While there is danger that computer breakdown may possibly cause havoc and even destruction of property and lives, certainly in the last decade or two, the computer has had a powerful impact upon every area of life. This includes education, transportation, business enterprise and, most of all, communication in all its manifestations.

While for many people communication technology has enhanced knowledge and been of great aid in the learning process, there are many scholars who are afraid that some will see it as replacing the reading and study of books as the key to attaining knowledge and developing right values in life.

I am writing this just before the Jewish Book Fair in Toronto begins, and by the time you see the article in print, the book fair will hopefully have attracted thousands of Jews, young and old.

One of the major purposes of Jewish Book Month is to remind us of the fundamental role that Jewish books have played in the creation and development of the Jewish people. Furthermore, with all the changes in our way of life, Jewish people must still continue to use and study books each and every day.

Obviously we begin with the prayer book, but we must continue with the study of Torah by children and adults. This begins with the weekly study of the Torah portion, and at different stages of our lives, it continues with the study of the Mishnah, the Talmud, Jewish history and the many books teaching the high ethical and moral standards that Judaism must continue to implant in Jewish families.

By coincidence, as I was completing this article, I found an interesting report in the Globe and Mail (Nov. 2). It quoted the speech made at York University by Umberto Eco. The renowned Italian writer said journalists always ask him whether new interactive technology will kill the book, the author or even literature. He responds that "if books are respected, they can provide us with wisdom."

There is no question that with all our concerns about the rising rate of intermarriage and the apathy and indifference of the majority of our young people in colleges and universities about the Jewish component in their lives, there are many positive features. There are considerably more young and old people starting to study Talmud and other Jewish books than ever before in Jewish history. The number even surpasses the period of Jewish history in eastern Europe that was filled with religious intensity and committed observance.

I trust that the book fairs in North America and the celebration of Jewish Book Month will be a positive reminder of the tremendous benefit that every member of the Jewish family can receive by reading or studying a Jewish book every day. I have no doubt that the Internet and the computer, which have also spread Jewish knowledge, can also serve as an inspiration to people to study further on their own, attend various classes and have a Jewish book in their hand each and every day.

The Jewish people were the first ones to have a high standard of literacy. May we continue to live up to our name, am hasefer, the people of the book.

The Jewish Highway

A brit milah roundup

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I wrap up my look at the brit milah on the Jewish Highway with some advice for including siblings at the ceremony; a place where you can share your thoughts about the procedure; and a brief survey of the way brit milah has been portrayed on television.

Rabbi Mark Cooper provides some thoughtful advice about including siblings in their new brother's brit ceremony [http://www.exit109.com/~mohel/siblings.htm]. "Keep in mind that the birth of a new baby is often a difficult time for a toddler...Little children can be included in the brit milah ceremony in a number of ways.

You might have your older child/ren help bring the baby into the room by walking alongside the adults who receive this honor. You could also write a simple prayer or statement that your child could read or say, such as, "I am happy to have a new baby brother. I will help him learn and grow and I will play with him."

Over at the Liberal Jewish Category Index, people can share their opinions in lively discussions about brit milah [http://silk.compclass.com/mlj/category/c7.html]. When I checked, there were dialogues about such topics as Brit milah and the Reform movement, and Circumcision, anti-circumcision, anti-Semitism. But my favorite discussion focussed on a recent episode of ER in which a non-Jewish patient agrees to undergo a medical circumcision to appease his Jewish girlfriend. A typical comment: "I felt personally offended and insulted, and I suspect that others of us who are either on the road towards or have taken the path of a sincere, serious conversion to Judaism, and an adoption of the Jewish people, felt the same way. I mean, to have conversion to Judaism portrayed in this way on one of, if not the, most popular shows on television? Good grief!" [http://silk.compclass.com/mlj/subject/s2796.html]

Good grief, indeed. Although the brit milah is a pillar of Judaism, its treatment in western culture is much more uncertain. When you do a search of brit milah on the Internet, in addition to the numerous Judaic sites, you are struck by the number of television series that have used the brit as a gimmicky plot device.

In an episode of Seinfeld, Jerry, George and gang find themselves, reluctantly, at a brit, with Jerry holding the baby [http://www.geocities.com/Hollywood/Theater/3205/seinbris.htm]. In an episode of thirtysomething called "Prelude to a Bris," an intermarried couple grapples whether to go ahead with the procedure [http://www.arches.uga.edu/~lasteven/30s4ep/bris.html]. Brit themes have also been used on Cheers [http://www.tardis.ed.ac.uk/~dave/guides/Cheers/8.8.html] and more recently on South Park [http://www.kettering.edu/~kubi0461/episodes.html]. Skip these links if you are interested in the traditional Jewish take on brit milah.

However, one TV brit milah stands out mainly because it was funny, ridiculous and inoffensive, at least to me. About 20 years ago, there was a television advertisement for a luxury automobile. To prove the car's superior ride, they had a diamond cutter go about his work in the back seat. He studies his subject, takes a swing and exclaims "Perfect!" So, along comes Saturday Night Live with their parody. But instead of a diamond cutter, they placed a mohel in the car [http://ccwf.cc.utexas.edu/cgi-bin/cgiwrap/serpas/snlsrch.cgi?77h]. The "mohel" studies his subject, takes a swing and exclaims "Perfect!" And it was.

A series that looks at the family relationships of our early ancestors. Forging monotheism was only one facet to these early generations. We will look at texts that convey how these people were as parents and spouses. Was the biblical family a model we can look to or were they filled with problems? Through studying together we will observe husbands, wives, brothers, sisters and parents as they struggle with the same issues we find in our own homes.

Kristallnacht remembered

That fateful night in '38

By HANNA TENNENHAUS

Guest Voices

That fateful night, Nov. 9, 1938, I studied late. After finishing my homework, I took a piece of paper from a notebook, wrote Ich hasse Hitler (I hate Hitler), then quickly burned it in the dying embers remaining in the red tiled stove and went to bed.

At 2 a.m. there was a great commotion in the street. "Juden raus, Juden raus" (Jews out, Jews out) went the awful shouts. Our bell rang incessantly. My mother, in a long white nightgown, went from room to room in great agitation, while my father prayed silently.

Finally, I opened the door to our apartment. The front door had already been opened by the depufy mayor of our town, who lived on the second floor and was obviously aware of all the horrors to follow.

In front of me stood three machine-gun toting SA men, who told us to get dressed quickly and come with them. I was not quite 15, my anger was greater than my fear, and I told those thugs, "You'll have to wait while I brush my teeth."

They obeyed, dumfounded by my defiance, which could have cost me my life.

We crossed the park, small but lovely, where I had spent many happy hours playing or reading, and we were led to a large square where the whole Jewish community was being herded together.

Mrs. Einstein, our paralyzed neighbor in her 80s, was dragged there, suffering shock and numerous bruises as a consequence. The square was surrounded by armed Nazis. Someone asked to go to the bathroom and was scornfully told: "Jews don't need that!"

Men, women and children were ordered to stand apart. Not wanting to leave my trembling mother, I disobeyed.

Our usually awe-inspiring principal and physics teacher arrived in pyjamas with his family, including twin baby girls in a carriage.

The November night was exceptionally cold. We were standing there shivering and dazed, in shock and fear.

Suddenly the sky turned pink

Suddenly, the sky turned pink. The synagogues, not far away, were burning, together with the community centre, the library and and the mikvah. Some people were screaming, "They are going to burn us alive!"

Around 7 a.m. they led us through the streets to a hall once donated by a Jewish philanthropist. We were jeered by emerging townspeople. Then the women and children were sent home, the men incarcerated in the hall. Some beatings and sadism took place, but none of the fathers ever spoke about it.

A few hours after the release of the women and children, a neighbor came to our apartment asking me to accompany her to the hall to give her imprisoned husband his heart medicine. When we arrived there, an armed Nazi guard sneeringly told the poor lady: "Your husband won't need his pills. We are going to burn you all, together with your swinish Torah scrolls."

Soon after we arrived home, the bell rang once again: more armed Brown Shirts looking for men. I trembled for two hours. Later in the day, news spread that we could bring food to our captive men. I hardboiled two eggs, added some bread and set out once more into the hostile streets.

A solitary figure was walking towards me – it was my father, who was the only man released. The others would be sent to the Dachau concentration camp.

To this day I remember the incredible joy I felt, comparable only to my overflowing gratitude when my brother Joseph came home from Dachau, eight long weeks later.

Meanwhile I had witnessed the disintegration of my home and school life, the premature end to my childhood and the decimation of my ancient community.

I was sent to England with the Kindertransport; my brother and sister also escaped to England. Sadly, my parents with 900 others from our community (almost half) perished in concentration camps. May their martyrdom never be forgotten.

Hanna Tennenhaus lives in Montreal.

Ottawa Fly-In

Face to Face on Parliament Hill

A large UJA Federation delegation took Jewish concerns directly to our country's capital last week.

More than 50 UJA Federation Ottawa Fly-In participants kept a quick-pace from dawn till dusk as they met political leaders, diplomats, members of parliament and journalists to discuss a range of current issues, such as homelessness, national unity, foreign policy and government action on bringing Nazi war criminals to justice.

Members of UJA Federation's Corporate Partners Program were up at the crack of dawn to join Ottawa Fly-In participants. (l-r) John Hutchinson, Senior Manager, Deputy Real Estate, Royal Bank; Angie Lopes, Account Manager, Royal Bank; Lorri Kushnir, Chair, Partners; Anne Fox, Account Executive, Accord Communications Inc.; and Jeff Carney, Senior VP, TD Bank.

Former Liberal MP Barry Campbell, who accompanied the group, which included university students and UJA Federation corporate sponsors, added an experienced perspective to presentations by Reform Party Whip Chuck Strahl, NDP leader Alexa McDonough and Bloc Quebecois member Pierre De Savoye.

Highlights of the mission included private luncheon sessions with MPs Elinor Caplan, Carolyn Bennett, Joe Volpe and Defence Minister Art Eggleton - who welcomed the opportunity to be "reminded where UJA Federation dollars go" - and a visit to the Treasures of Egypt exhibit at the National Museum of Civilization.

There, Israeli Deputy Ambassador Chen Ivri and Egyptian Ambassador Mohammed Hamdy Nada expressed their governments' support for the re-invigorated peace-process.

The group ended the day at a dinner with guest speaker Jim Peterson, Secretary of State for Financial Institutions.

"I feel privileged to have been part of such a meaningful expression of communal commitment," noted John Hutchinson of the Royal Bank, one of UJA Federation's Corporate Partners. "We have certainly made an impact."

"It's wonderful to be able to devote an entire day to important issues affecting our future as a community as well as those affecting all Canadians," said Rick Orzy, who co-chaired the 1998 Ottawa Fly-In with Jill Reitman.

Toba Korenblum was CJN reporter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish News reporter Toba Korenblum was known for her artistic talent, love of theatre and music, her concern for children and for her good-hearted nature. Korenblum died last week after a lengthy battle with cancer. She was 47 years old.

Korenblum joined The CJN in 1975 as part of its summer intern program. In her three years with the paper, she gained a reputation as a top reporter specializing in local news. Lewis Levendel, former CJN associate editor and a close friend of Korenblum, said she was "an editor's dream.

"She was tops. She was the finest reporter I dealt with in my seven years at The CJN."

Winner of the 1978 Smolar Award for feature writing, Korenblum was known for her intelligence, sense of humor and her upbeat attitude, Levendel said.

CJN columnist Miriam Herman remembers Korenblum as "an A-one quality person. She was very bright and very sensitive. I felt she was always optimistic. I never heard her complain. She was just very high quality."

Gary Laforet, The CJN's general manager, recalled Korenblum as "a superb reporter and a wonderful person. She had a smooth writing style and there never was a question about accuracy."

Prior to joining The CJN, Korenblum worked in public relations for the Canadian Cancer Society. "She was working to promote awareness in cancer recognition," her husband, Marshall, said.

Following her stint at The CJN, Korenblum worked as a freelance writer for the Globe and Mail, Maclean's and for the University of Toronto's alumni magazine.

Obituary

She went back to school at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) where she earned a masters degree in clinical child psychology. She had just started the PhD program when she fell ill, Marshall said.

In addition to her studies, Korenblum worked with a psychologist, providing private tutoring to learning disabled students, her husband said.

"Toba was unselfish, altruistic, always thinking of other people," Marshall said. "She was always devoted to family. Family was the most important thing to her."

A modern-day Renaissance woman, Toba was also a talented violinist who played with the National Youth Orchestra. She loved music, culture, theatre and painting.

In his eulogy, Rabbi Chezi Zionce of the First Narayever Congregation remembered Korenblum as "someone who had the idealism, the virtue, the drive to make the world a better place.

"To all of us Toba was the epitome of goodness. We think of her and we understand the depth of those over-used Yiddish expressions 'a gitte nishama' (good soul), a 'fine mentsch.'"

Korenblum is survived by her husband Marshall, her children Jacob and Chana, her parents Henry and Helen Goldenberg, her sisters Ricky and Malka Goldenberg, and her brother and sister-in-law, Leslie and Susan Goldenberg.

Her family has established the Toba Korenblum Fund for Children with donations being forward to Sparrow Lake Alliance, a multi-disciplinary research and advocacy group for children's mental health. For further information, contact the department of psychiatry, Hospital for Sick Children 813-7560.

Teens lend helping hand

MARKHAM — The Friendship Circle is a new program that will give teens the opportunity to interact with and help other young people who are developmentally challenged.

Members of the Chabad Teen Club, under the leadership of Zev Herman, will volunteer their time to visit an adopted friend regularly and help with homework or other chores. The program is designed to help the challenged young people create bonds and integrate into society. At the same time, it will also expose the volunteers to the real world and help them learn the joy that comes from giving to and helping others.

Another goal of the Friendship Circle is to offer a helping hand to families in the Jewish community who have children with special needs that are not met by other agencies, and to offer friendship, support and encouragement to those children.

Members will relieve some of the burden on the parents or siblings responsible for the care of the child with the special needs. The volunteers will not be left alone with the children without adult supervision, but the pressure felt by many parents to interact with the children will be eased for a couple of hours weekly.

In order to attract volunteers who are committed to a regular schedule of visits, incentives offered to all members will include trips, social events, quality training and brainstorming sessions with renowned professionals.

The program is sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch in conjunction with Zareinu, a community school for children with special needs up to age 14.

For more information, call Zev Herman, teen coordinator, at 905-886-0420.

2,200 long-term beds slated for Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish seniors in North York will benefit from a new 120-bed facility at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and 183 new beds at North York General Hospital (NYGH).

These are among 2,200 new long-term care beds to be made available in Toronto in the largest single expansion for this purpose ever announced by the Ontario government.

In all, there will be 740 new beds in North York, Cam Jackson, Ontario minister for long-term care, announced at a lunch at Baycrest.

The new beds at Baycrest should be ready by June of the year 2000, said Stephen Herbert, Baycrest president and CEO, welcoming the minister's announcement.

The awarding of the contract to Baycrest is an acknowledgement of the pre-eminent role the hospital plays in the field of geriatrics, Herbert said.

A new feature of the Baycrest expansion is that the 120 beds will be developed in smaller resident home areas of 24 and 28 residents.The provincial maximum is 32 units.

The Jewish community is aging at twice the rate of the general community, he said.

North York General has been given the go-ahead for 32 new beds at its Seniors Health Centre, and for another 151-bed facility at a site to be named.

The government announcement said only that NYGH will build a new 151-bed long term care facility. This appears to rule out converting empty beds at Branson Hospital for this purpose.

Extendicare (Canada) Inc. has been awarded a 112-bed facility in North York at a site yet to be named. This will include a unit for people with Alzheimer and related disorders.

The Salvation Army has been awarded a 200-bed facility in North York and another 200-bed building to replace Grace Hospital in Toronto.

Villa Colombo Home for the Aged and Villa Charities will be adding 125 beds to their existing long-term care facility.

"I'm looking forward to new proposals from B'nai Brith... and Baycrest before April 1999, because we intend to build another 3,700 long-term care beds in Toronto," Jackson told his Baycrest audience.

The minister said he was particularly happy to make his announcement at Baycrest because his mother, born in eastern Europe, had been raised by the Jewish community in Winnipeg, and as a result he understood Jewish concerns.

The new long-term care beds, he said, were Premier Mike Harris' way of fulfilling a promise to look after his own parents in their old age.

Those chosen to build the new beds for seniors had to meet strict standards, he said. One of his department's concerns was that the beds be in small, home-like surroundings and that the cultural needs of ethnic communities be understood and met.

Herbert acknowledged a gift of $18.9 million dollars from the Ontario government for the new 470-bed Apotex Home for the Aged and the cognitive centre, now being built at Baycrest.

Other contracts were awarded to: Doctors Hospital (200 beds); Leisureworld Inc. (160 beds in Etobicoke, 128 beds in East York and a second 160-bed facility in East York); Oakwood Retirement Communities (120 beds in York); St. Demetrius (Ukrainian Catholic) Development Corporation, (41 beds in Etobicoke); Slovenian Linden Foundation (36 beds in Etobicoke); West Park Hospital (200 beds on its existing site in York); Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care (65 beds added to the existing facility and a new 150-bed facility in Scarborough).

Spanish rabbi offers prescription for retaining Jewish identity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL, ONT. — Rabbi Benito Garzon has little regard for rabbis who isolate themselves in yeshiva. "This is not the way. You must learn, and you must share," the Madrid-based educational director and spiritual leader of the World Sephardic Educational Center (SEC) said at a recent lecture on Jewish Identity.

In town recently as part of a tour that included Los Angeles, Seattle, New York and Montreal, Rabbi Garzon put his philosophy into practice at unexpected moments. He explained the significance of his blessing over the water he drank during his talk at the Sephardic Kehila Centre (sponsored by Toronto's SEC young adult chapter), and expounded briefly on Sephardi Torah commentaries while having his picture taken.

He even started his talk with a word on the joy of singing and launched into a spirited version of Happy Birthday for SEC founder José Nessim, who was here from Los Angeles. After presenting Nessim with a gift, Rabbi Garzon, 61, jumped nimbly back onto the podium and rolled up his sleeves. "Are you ready to work?" he asked.

"Together we will enter the kitchen of our inner life, and we will prepare a dish to attract people...closer to Hakodesh Baruch Hu."

Many Jews have not only tried to lose their Jewish identity, he said, but they have also tried to imitate "those who persecuted us...That is a tragedy. We need you to build the Jewish identity."

An identity is based on time and space, he explained. He exhorted parents to celebrate their children's next birthday on the Jewish date – and not at a non-kosher restaurant. "Parents wish and pray for [their child] to be married under the chuppah, but make the effort for the opposite thing."

Rabbi Benito Garzon

An identity is a collective experience, he noted. "If I believe only that my own identity is the true Jewish identity, then I am not a Jew; I am a Garzonista. What we're looking for is not Garzonismo. It's Judaism."

Collective experience

There are Jewish ways of dress and of eating, he said. "Why do we give up our way?"

Jews have the right and duty to retain their identity, which comes from actions, not feelings, he said.

"That is why the Torah is built on 'do' and 'not do.'" Those who adhere to its tenets will "receive a prize, which is your Jewish identity."

SEC, which has 27 branches around the world, advocates slow change said the rabbi. "We don't like to make a fight between the old identity and the new."

A native of Tetouan, Morocco who speaks seven languages and has post-graduate degrees in philosophy and philology, Rabbi Garzon said in an interview he never left the country of his birth. His ancestors, incidentally, were Spanish Jews who left Granada after the expulsion.

"My Jewish life in Morocco is living with me," he said. "I am nourished by that until today. I'm wealthy with [memory], but I'm aware that my daughters, son and grandson cannot benefit by that."

He said the Sephardi community is obliged to share its Jewish writings with the rest of the community. "We suffer when we see [that] the Jewish people [don't] share this treasure."

He moved to Madrid 32 years ago as community rabbi and has headed the Sephardic Educational Centre since 1980.

The small Jewish community in Madrid was established after World War II, he said. Rabbi Garzon agreed to go there on condition a Jewish school be opened. Today, he said, there are three synagogues and three rabbis (seven rabbis in all of Spain), a beit din, a day school and a youth movement serving about 300 youngsters.

Anti-Semitism is less prevalent in Spain than elsewhere in Europe, he noted. Religious persecution and Holocaust denial have been outlawed, and shortly before the rabbi's arrival here, a Barcelona trial regarding Holocaust denial began. It is the first of its kind in Spain.

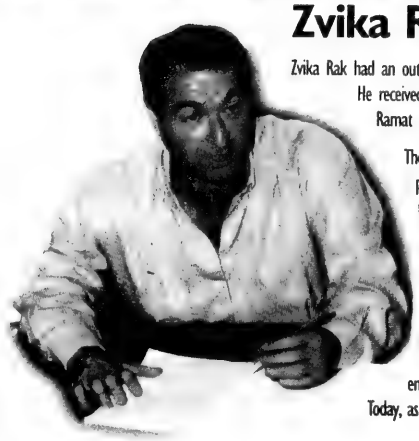
Zvika Rak. The Right Attitude



Zvika Rak had an outstanding military career. During the Six Day War he fought in the Sinai, El Arish and the Suez Canal. He received a medal during the Yom Kippur War and in 1972 was the Commander of the tank division in the Ramat H'golan area.

Then his life changed. He was seriously injured, his right arm severed from his body, his left arm completely mangled. 'When I look back, I think of how lucky I was. The rehabilitation and assistance from the Beit Halochem Centre in Haifa gave me the courage to feel strong and self-confident, not that the path to recovery was easy.'

Zvika then entered university to study public relations. When he graduated, he began Military College in Haifa., and was appointed Head of the Haifa Army District. Currently he is the chief auditor of Haifa.

'Today, as a family, we travel extensively, in and out of Israel. I have been able to shrug off any embarrassment swimming without my arm. Each person goes through rehabilitation in their own way. Today, as a Beit Halochem member, I help younger disabled soldiers.'

JNF honoree a man-for-all-seasons

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Family life and traditional values are very important to Allan Silber, this year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree.

On Nov. 29 at The National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place, the Toronto community will pay tribute to Silber "in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel."

Proceeds from the 50th annual JNF dinner will help create a unique fund.

In his honor, The Allan Silber Endowment Fund will be established in Israel in order to create an additional, more stable and enduring source of monies for particular JNF projects.

"He is a good friend and a very, very forthright person," says Albert Reichmann, campaign and dinner co-chair with Michael Bregman and Dale Lastman. "He deserves this honor because of his charitable involvements in many institutions."

A self-made man, Silber is a successful business entrepreneur, philanthropist and man-for-all-seasons. His charitable work and community involvements range from the Orthodox to the secular.

Interviewed at their Forest Hill home, his wife Hinda, an active community worker, spoke about her husband. "One of the things that is important to me is that Allan can be immersed in the business world, but first and foremost is his family and his Judaism. When he goes up to lead a synagogue service, our family is filled with pride and admiration."

Silber is chairman and CEO of Counsel Corporation, one of North America's leading health-care and business development companies. Joined by partners, Morris Perlis and Edward Sonshine, the story of

Allan Silber

Counsel Corporation's growth and expansion is both a business and friendship success story.

His parents Godel and Cilka Silber, Holocaust survivors, created in their Hamilton home an environment with a strong emphasis on Jewish tradition, tzedakah and synagogue activity.

After graduating with an honors degree in biology at the University of Toronto in 1970, Silber changed direction and studied accountancy "because of my passion for business." With a decade of accounting experience in mergers and acquisitions, and taking his first steps in buying and selling real estate, he left accountancy to set up Counsel Corporation with the acquisition of Counsel Trust.

Buying and restructuring home healthcare and institutional pharmacies in the United States have catapulted Counsel's holdings.

Silber says, "Coming from a traditional Jewish background has affected my ideals and values – I learned how to give back to the community and how to make a difference."

He says he accepted the JNF honor because he believes that the endowment fund would help "to buy into my vision of a more secure future for JNF."

He emphasizes that supporting community means including all Jews. "I believe that there is a need for all segments of Judaism – we all bring different elements together that make us all stronger."

He adds that Jewish education and traditional values are the backbone of Jewish survival. "To know where you come from strengthens us as Jews and helps us develop self-pride."

The Silbers are members of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

"In my experience with him over the past 15 years, Allan exemplifies the Talmudic principal of – a son is the knee cap of the father causing him to stand or fall," Rabbi Henry Hoschander, former rabbi of Shaarei Shomayim told The CJN.

"Allan comes from a home that is deeply concerned with Torah Judaism in all of its ramifications – service to God and service to man."

He is a member of the executive committee and board of Mount Sinai Hospital, he is also on the boards of JNF and Weizmann Institute and he has been honored by many institutions including Lubavitch, Aish HaTorah and State of Israel Bonds.

His list of community involvements locally and internationally includes, the United Way, Yeshiva University, Bar-Ilan University, Hebrew University, ROM, AGO, and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Hinda (Rosen) and Allan, who met at the University of Toronto and married in 1970, have four children, Josh 26, Leah 23, and twins Jay and David, 19.

Educators get lesson in teaching the Holocaust

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first goal of teaching the Holocaust is to complicate students' thinking, says Frank Bialystok, former chair of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

Bialystok was giving the dinner address at the 18th annual teachers' seminar on teaching the Holocaust, held recently at the Lipa Green Building.

He cited the scene in the movie Schindler's List in which the strains of a Mozart composition were played during a mass execution of residents of the Cracow ghetto.

"We must bring to the student the imbalance of Mozart and the destruction of the ghetto occurring simultaneously."

Students must understand that the horrible and the normal existed side by side, he said. "Anti-Semites saved Jews, while supposedly non-anti-Semitic police murdered them; some Jews did horrible things to survive, and some did incredibly heroic stuff. Often the same people did both."

At the same time, he said, "we must balance the universality of the event with its uniqueness."

In other words, he said, teachers must decide whether to teach about other victims of the Nazis, such as the Romani and homosexuals, or about other genocides.

"We must decide on a definition of unique, and ask ourselves can if we place limits on what is universal."

Bialystok, who now teaches at York University, called his approach to teaching the Holocaust "questionable, and not perfect, but mine."

Relative to the time and resources available and the age of the students, Bialystok said, teachers must teach the "where, when, and the progression of events" of the Holocaust.

The students must get to the point where they realize that "the more we learn, the more difficult it is to understand and to comprehend what happened."

At the same time, he said, while we must deal with the Holocaust as an event in history, a teacher should limit the universal implications of it. "Don't teach the Holocaust as a means of teaching about other genocides. If you want to teach about others, and you should, teach them.

"It is important to understand that the fate of European Jewry is also the fate of the Cambodians, the Rwandans and others – dead people. However, each one had a uniqueness."

It is not helpful to mix all tragedies together, he said. "We must teach them separately, and then draw universal implications."

Bialystok spoke about a meeting he attended between survivors of the Holocaust and survivors of the genocide in Rwanda.

The Rwandans wanted to learn from the Holocaust survivors how to talk about their dreadful experiences, how to pass on the information to a younger generation. This, he said, is what educators have to come to grips with.

The question period following Bialystok's speech emphasized the difficulties teachers felt they were encountering because of recent changes in the Ontario education system.

One participant lamented that he used to teach The Diary of Anne Frank in history, religion and English classes. Now, he said, because of the strictures against interdisciplinary approaches to subjects, he can teach it only in English class, making its impact and message less effective.

Bialystok suggested a good subject for discussion might be whether Anne Frank would have been able to write her famous line, "I believe that people are good at heart," if she had written her diary in Bergen Belsen, where she died.

The dinner was followed by workshops on Exploring Holocaust Issues through an Integrated Arts Approach; Pedagogical Challenges (of teaching the Holocaust); Facing History & Ourselves: an approach to teaching the Holocaust; and Exceptional Materials for the Holocaust educator.

Jews in Israel not sheep for the slaughter: author

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — If a safe haven for Jews had been created in 1937, millions of European Jews would have been saved, says Michael Bar-Zohar, author, lecturer and official biographer of David Ben-Gurion.

"That was the main lesson learned in 1948, when the State of Israel was created," he said.

Bar-Zohar, speaking at Pride of Israel Synagogue during Holocaust Education Week, said several conditions existed when Israel was created. "As well as providing a safe haven for Jews, the country had to be able to withstand the dangers of hostile environments."

In order to keep Israel safe, Jewish people had to be educated, said Bar-Zohar. "They had to learn that they are not sheep being led to slaughter. No longer is their blood free."

People coming to Israel, he said, had lived for years under the reality that they were victims. "Now they are free, and anyone who tries to [hurt] them will be punished."

When Adolph Eichmann was found in 1960, Ben-Gurion wanted him brought to Israel alive, said Bar-Zohar, so that during the trial, the younger generation would learn about the Holocaust. "Every year now, we commemorate the Holocaust and teach the youth about it. Soon, however, [the people will be gone]. Only books, movies and papers about the Holocaust will exist."

Just knowing about the Holocaust is not enough, he said. "We must take practical steps so that it will not happen again."

Europe is more advanced than North America in dealing with Holocaust deniers, said Bar-Zohar. "If you deny the Holocaust in France or Germany, you go to jail. Here, we talk about the freedom of speech. But freedom of speech is wrong, when the person is talking about Holocaust denial.

"People with good rhetoric can convince [others] of the worst lies. I believe that if we commemorate the Holocaust, we must take it one step further. We must fight for laws to prohibit Nazi propaganda."

We must not only remember the Holocaust, he said, we must nip Holocaust denial in the bud. "This is more important than remembering. There must be a bottom line of action."

For the first time in history, he said, all Jews, no matter where they live, are free. "There is not one place where they are persecuted or mistreated. We have succeeded to create a new reality. Anyone can leave their country and go to Israel.

"I believe that all Jews stand taller because they know there is a safe place for them. Everywhere in the world, Jewish people feel better and stronger," he said.

If Israel makes peace, he said, that will preserve the safe haven. "We have to put all our efforts into making it strong.We must find ways to live with our neighbors in peace."

Bar-Zohar said he does not expect the Arab neighbors to "join Hadassah or give to the United Jewish Appeal, but the bottom line is that for the last 20 years, we have not been shooting at each other. Even if we don't start to love each other, it's enough for our generation – learning to live together without killing each other."

The lecture was co-sponsored by Jerry and Karmela Klasner in honor of Joseph and Katie Klasner.

Poet says truth 'will set us free'

By FRANCES KRAFT

TORONTO — Despite the grim subject of Ursula Duba's poetry, the Connecticut-based author, in town recently to read from her work and speak at Shaar Shalom Synagogue for Holocaust Education Week, maintains a positive outlook on life.

"I don't feel I give darkness to people," Duba, a jewelery designer and mother of two grown children, told The CJN. "I believe that the only thing that will set us free is the truth, no matter how painful."

Born to a Catholic family in Cologne, Germany in 1938, Duba only learned of the Holocaust at the age of 19, on a blind date with a Jewish man.

Ursula Duba

In her 1995 book, Tales from a Child of the Enemy, Duba described her horror, shame and rage in a poem entitled Blind Date:

till the end of her life/she would have to prove/that she wasn't one of them

"I became obsessed with trying to find out who are the people who raised me, and who are the Jews." There was an angry confrontation with her parents and then a stay on an Israeli kibbutz, where she was met with warmth and openness the likes of which she'd never experienced.

"I couldn't, after that, think of the Jews as 'the Jews,'" – a term she abhors. Instead, they became "Moshe and Dalia and Leah..."

Almost 40 years later, Duba (her pen name, the Hebrew equivalent of Ursula, meaning she-bear) still has close friends in Israel.

But she won't put Jews on a

Holocaust Education Week

Parents must tread carefully in discussing Shoah: lecturer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —One of the worst things parents can do when talking to their children about the Holocaust is to frighten them, according to a Toronto psychologist who spoke as part of Holocaust Education Week.

"Fear doesn't aid their understanding of the experience," said Alan Bardikoff, a specialist in treating children and adolescents and a past chair of the education committee of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

Bardikoff discussed How and When to Talk to your Children about the Holocaust at the Posluns Education Centre branch of Associated Hebrew Day Schools.

He also addressed classroom issues and recommended that parents talk to teachers about their own anxieties, children's fears and dealing at home with what's being taught.

He advised against using the Holocaust to "secure" Jewish identity or to justify the existence of Israel. To say Israel came about because of the Holocaust, Bardikoff believes, sends "wrong messages about the ways in which we achieve things, the ways history works, the way in which God works."

He also said he worries "when people talk about the Holocaust in a way that engenders undue anger toward the non-Jewish community.

"How can one accept a conclusion from the Holocaust that preaches anger, perhaps even hatred? These were one of the greatest weapons that were used against us."

Bardikoff, who is not a child of survivors, became interested in the Holocaust and Holocaust education as a teenager, after he was asked to take part in a Holocaust memorial service. He found the experience moving and said that making an emotional connection was the key.

When it comes to teaching young children about the Holocaust, it's important to "really listen" to them. "We have to start where they are, not where we are."

He advised caution in terms of what to allow children to watch and experience. Graphic information on how people were killed is "clearly inappropriate" for a 5-year-old.

Stories and literature, particularly those focusing on one person's or one family's experience, can begin to create a connection for children, Bardikoff said. Most valuable, he added, is the opportunity to hear a survivor speak.

It's also important, Bardikoff said, for children to understand what it is to be a bystander, and even to learn about victimizers.

Parents should not feel they have failed if they cannot talk about the Holocaust. "Some people really can't. It doesn't mean our kids shouldn't learn about it. Obviously it's incumbent on us to find other ways for them to learn about it."

He believes it's fair for parents to tell children they need time to think before answering a question, and pointed out that there are positive stories of dignity and rescue that can be shared.

pedestal. "I have no problem saying '[someone] drives me up the wall with her kvetching.'"

Duba's quest seriously damaged her relationships with her six siblings and now-deceased parents.

Her parents were not implicated in the Holocaust, she said, but their feeling she has betrayed them is not atypical.

"Germany doesn't want to touch my book with a 10-foot pole."

The book includes Duba's perspective and that of Jewish survivors whose stories she heard as a young woman living in Brooklyn.

Living in a Jewish neighborhood, people often assumed she was Jewish, but as she got to know them, she set the record straight.

When she paid by cheque for the first time in a Lower East Side fabric store, the shopkeeper expressed surprise at her non-Jewish first name and Jewish surname (her ex-husband was half-Jewish). But even when she said she wasn't Jewish, she felt "very much" accepted.

German students respond with anger or silence

She derives "enormous strength" from her work and is thus ignoring friends' advice to steer clear of Holocaust issues while undergoing treatment for breast cancer.

In fact, she attended other Holocaust Education Week events.

Despite the goodwill and sense of community she feels from such events, she believes the gentile world should be sponsoring the week, "considering that anti-Semitism is a non-Jewish problem."

Having spoken in American and German schools, she finds German students generally respond to her with anger or stony silence, she said in her address at Shaar Shalom. But other students express sorrow and are often moved to tears.

"I actually went so far as to start by saying [in Germany], 'You are innocent.' It didn't work...They feel sorrow is an admission of guilt."

Although the situation in Germany is "much improved," it took Duba two years to gain admittance to a school there. Teachers are ambivalent about Holocaust education, and parents born after the war ask their children, "Are they ever going to let you alone?"

What is needed, she said, is an emotional link with young people.

Vatican apology invites Catholic 'tshuvah:' priest

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last spring's historic Vatican document apologizing for Church members' silence and inaction during the Holocaust is just the beginning of "a process" of Catholic reconciliation with Jews, a priest told a synagogue audience last week.

Father Thomas Rosica, executive director of the Newman Centre at the University of Toronto and an advisor on Catholic matters to the Israeli government, said the document issued last March "is not just an apology. It's much more significant than that. It's the beginning of a process of repentance."

Addressing a Holocaust Education Week program at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Father Rosica said the document "invites Catholics into a deep process of tshuvah and a purification of memory."

The 14-page document, entitled We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, urged Catholics to repent for their failure to do more to help Jews during the Holocaust. It decried the "unspeakable tragedy" of the Holocaust, and speaks of a "moral imperative" Catholics should have to ensure that persecution of Jews never happens again.

The carefully worded document, issued by the Church's commission on religious relations with Jews, was 11 years in the making. It said Catholics "deeply regret the errors and failures of those sons and daughters of the Church" during World War II, and express "deep sorrow" for failures throughout the ages.

For many, however, the document fell short in its defence of wartime Pope Pius XII from accusations he could have done much more to save Jews.

Father Rosica said Pope John Paul, who was implored to issue the document in 1987, has done more to advance Catholic-Jewish relations than any pontiff in history.

"People have stopped counting the number of times" the Pope has spoken out against anti-Semitism and the evils of Nazism. In 1986, Pope John Paul became the first pope to visit Rome's main synagogue, and a few years ago, he established formal diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Israel, Father Rosica noted. He said the Vatican has also established Aug. 9 as a day of Holocaust remembrance.

The Pope has a "deep sympathy and affection for Jews," and he's "not just mimicking saying he's sorry. He's made this a very important issue."

Father Rosica said that some people saw the Vatican's statement as an attempt to absolve Catholics. "Nothing can be further from the truth. It acknowledges and recognizes [Catholics'] complicity."

He acknowledged the "new pain" caused by the recent canonization of Edith Stein, a nun who was born a Jew, and who was murdered at Auschwitz.

But he called for a start to reconciliation. "We must deeply commit to work together. The process will be very risky and painful. We need each other on this journey of healing."

Later, addressing an audience member – a Holocaust survivor who said she lived as a Christian in Poland but was betrayed to the Nazis by her Catholic neighbors – Father Rosica said, "I am very sorry for what my people have done."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec remarked that the Vatican's statement "did not look critically enough" at the role played by Pope Pius XII, and said Jews "find it very difficult for Edith Stein to be held out as a bridge between Catholics and Jews."

Historian examines Pope's response to Shoah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In December 1942, following requests by American and British diplomatic envoys, Pope Pius XII issued a statement condemning Nazi atrocities.

The pope's condemnation was made "in a highly abstract and ornamental language" that never specifically mentioned the word "Jews," according to history professor Michael Marrus.

Nevertheless, it was "unmistakable" that the pope was in fact referring to Jews, he said.

Marrus, dean of the school of graduate studies at the University of Toronto, was speaking to about 200 people at the Holy Blossom Temple during Holocaust Education Week. His focus was on the controversy surrounding Pope Pius XII and his role during the Holocaust.

A number of factors combined to create such a muted papal response to the slaughter of European Jews, Marrus said.

The fate of the Jews was not a high priority for the Vatican or among the Allies, he said. Pope Pius was concerned primarily about the fate of the Roman Catholic Church during the war, and whether the Nazis would act against it.

Furthermore, the church was inundated with appeals for condemnations from various quarters – the Polish government in exile, Serbs, Jews, even German and Italian representatives, who asked that he condemn the Allied bombings of their cities.

In the midst of all that, Pope Pius concerned himself with the survival of the Church as an institution, Marrus said.

Addressing the "might have beens," Marrus said there are those who argue a "burning protest" would have backfired and made things worse for the Jews.

One Israeli historian has suggested that it might have put Jews hiding under the protection of the church in danger, Marrus said.

Marrus, author of Vichy France and the Jews and The Holocaust in History, outlined the background circumstances that influenced the Vatican's wartime actions.

"There is something unreal in considering the Vatican a major player in the ordeal of European Jewry," he said.

Otherworldly

The Vatican had no military and was vulnerable to the power of surrounding authorities. In addition, the Vatican was "culturally isolated, a world of priests and nuns who have an intensely ecclesiastical preoccupation...It is an otherworldly institution, very much apart."

Pope Pius XII, elected in 1939, was "austere, solitary and reserved" unlike his predecessor, Pope Pius XI, who had come into conflict with the fascist powers. Pope Pius XI had prepared an encyclical against racial policy but it never appeared, Marrus said.

The Church, which had preached theologically based anti-Judaism for centuries and which saw Jews as "a nefarious influence in the state," opposed racially motivated anti-Semitism, Marrus said. But the church's anti-Judaic tradition was adopted in collaborationist regimes, such as Vichy France, he added.

When the Vichy regime passed anti-Jewish laws in 1941, the Vatican advised its priests that it was permissible for the state to restrict the activities of the Jews. Marshall Petain, who headed the Vichy regime, saw that as "a green light," Marrus said.

In recent years, the Vatican established a committee to examine its relations with the Jews and its role during the Holocaust. The committee published its report in March 1998, titled, We Remember, A Reflection on the Shoah.

It was "the most important document ever issued by the Vatican on that subject," and it asked whether the Nazi persecution of the Jews was made easier by years of anti-Jewish preaching. The document looked forward to the day when there would be "no more anti-Judaism among Christians, and no more anti-Christian feelings among Jews," Marrus said.

National unity main focus of the Quebec election the Parti Québécois. As an indication that better days were ahead, the number of home buyers in Montreal soared in the months of April and May, a phenomenon widely attributed to Charest's arrival. But sustaining Charest's popularity at such high levels proved far more complex than might have been initially assumed.

Towards the end of the summer, Bouchard insisted that he would not hold a referendum on sovereignty unless conditions ensured a victory. This had the effect of somewhat diminishing the importance of Charest's strongest electoral plank.

While most French Quebecers believe that the issue of effective government takes precedence over the referendum question, the vast majority of members of Quebec minorities, including the Jewish community, regard national unity as the main focus of the election. Although most French Quebecers resist the idea of holding a referendum, they are equally if not more concerned by the concrete changes that the Charest Liberals might make in such areas as health and education.

Liberal victory not guaranteed

By September, it was clear that the state of Quebec public opinion was evolving. At the Oct. 28 call of the election, the Parti Québécois and the Liberals had nearly the same level of popular support amongst the provincial electorate. However, in terms of the critical distribution of provincial ridings, the Parti Québécois appeared to have a slight edge in a campaign whose major turning point has yet to arrive.

Like most Quebecers who strongly support Canadian unity, members of the overwhelmingly federalist Quebec Jewish community have also undergone significant mood swings, as public opinion polls suggested that a provincial Liberal victory was not guaranteed.

Many members of the community have put their hopes and energy behind the Charest campaign and are still cautiously optimistic about his chances of forming the next government. It is difficult to recall a provincial Liberal leader who was as popular as Charest is with the Jewish community. Even those in the community who have supported a considerably tougher public stand against Quebec language policies and separation have been keeping a lower profile in the campaign.

Charest remains quite capable of building the necessary momentum to carry him to victory. If he wins the election, most members of the Quebec Jewish community will likely feel a new sense of confidence about Quebec's future. Ironically much of the energy that members of the community have invested in national unity will be redirected into the health and education sectors.

In the event that the Parti Québécois wins the election, the Quebec Jewish community will not be taken by surprise. Undoubtedly, there will be a great degree of disappointment, but there will be less anxiety than there was in the aftermath of the 1976 Parti Québécois election victory or for that matter following the narrow results of the 1995 referendum. While there will likely be a further sense of being politically disempowered for many Quebec Jews, the community has learned to weather many a political storm.

Generally, the organized Quebec Jewish community leadership does not develop post-electoral strategies for its members, and in this case, such an approach is probably not warranted. It is after Nov. 30 that we will be better able to determine what is next on the Quebec political horizon.

Jack Jedwab is the executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies.

ככה זה - כשצריך להחזיק צבא חזק, אין כסף גם לבנות את הגדה המערבית וגם לחנך ילדים. מאחר ונתניהו בונה את הגדה המערבית, כבישים עוקפים, היאחזויות עם ארבע כיווני אויר ובידה - אין כסף לשלם למורים. לממן יום לימודים ארוך ומבנים.

FACTORY THEATRE:

אומרים שבטורונטו יש יותר תיאטרון מקורי פר גולגולת מאשר בכל עיר אחרת בעולם. אפילו אם זה לא מדויק ולונדון וניו יורק חזקות יותר, - עדיין יש הרבה מה לראות.

Federal judge appears biased in war crimes case: researcher

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Federal Court judge preparing to rule on whether alleged Nazi collaborator Vladimir Katriuk lied to enter Canada should recuse himself from the case, said a Montreal legal researcher.

Kenneth Narvey, who attended Katriuk's trial daily and is well known within Jewish community circles for his years of meticulously researching and chronicling war crimes cases, says that Judge Marc Nadon created a "reasonable apprehension of bias" through numerous comments he made during Katriuk's trial in Montreal last summer.

Among those comments, according to court transcripts, were June 15 remarks about, "Seagrams go[ing] after a little retailer" and about, "the forces of Seagrams [being] in some ways more extensive than those of the Government;" speculation over an unnamed Cabinet member saying, "[I]f the Jewish lobby wasn't after us we wouldn't be doing this;" an opinion that those who committed atrocities, "did not like what they were doing;" and the view that a Nazi collaborator is not, "necessarily a person of bad character."

According to Narvey, the "Seagrams" remark, "gives rise to a reasonable apprehension that Nadon has bought into the delusional anti-Semitic view, dating from the Middle Ages, that Jews are enormously powerful, malevolent beings."

'Malevolent beings'

Moreover, Narvey says Nadon made a "smoking gun" comment when he suggested to one of Katriuk's lawyers an argument that he could make.

Nadon told lawyer Nestor Woychyshyn, "I guess one thing you could say to me in argument, that it is possible that to those who had been in the French Foreign Legion and married a French national, the question [of how Katriuk spent the war years] wasn't asked..."

For Narvey, these comments, and others, clearly justify Nadon removing himself from the case.

"A person cannot be both assistant counsel and judge," Narvey said.

Crown lawyer David Lucas, however, does not agree with Narvey that Nadon's remarks, taken in their total context and not in an "isolated" way, give rise to the "reasonable apprehension of bias."

Although Lucas supported Narvey's bid in September to be granted intervenor status and to have his bias case heard – without supporting Narvey's actual allegations of bias – Lucas told The CJN that the time has come to "have the judgement."

Lucas reiterated his September position that Nadon's remarks were "unfortunate," but said that in the context of the entire trial, they were "totally innocuous."

"Bias is a prejudgement in favor of one of the parties," Lucas said. "I don't think if you look globally you can say that [is what you have here.]

"If you see how the whole hearing flowed, you won't find an apprehension of bias."

Nadon had been expected to decide the Katriuk case imminently, with Katriuk facing denaturalization and deportation if the Federal Court rules against him. He is charged with hiding his membership in a notorious Ukrainian SS battalion, implicated in numerous atrocities, at the time he applied to come to Canada.

Narvey, however, has since June sought twice to be granted intervenor status in the case, in the second instance last September so his bias allegations could be heard.

In both instances, Narvey's motions were denied by Nadon, and Narvey is now appealing the second rejection to intervene in the Federal Court of Appeal.

Meanwhile, on Oct. 19 in Toronto, before Federal Court trial division Judge Francis Muldoon, Narvey argued another motion, this one for a stay of proceedings pending the results of his appeal to intervene so his bias allegations could be heard. The reason for the stay motion was to make sure that Nadon not rule on the Katriuk case until Narvey's intervenor status is resolved.

According to both Lucas and Narvey, Nadon indicated in any case that he will not rule on Katriuk until Narvey's motion for a stay of proceedings is decided. It would be Nadon himself, however, who would hear Narvey's allegations of bias if he ultimately is granted intervenor status, and Nadon who would decide whether to recuse himself.

Should the bias allegations be heard and Nadon declines to recuse himself, Narvey indicated, he can and would appeal that decision in the Federal Court of Appeal.

The proceedings before Muldoon were attended by Narvey, Crown lawyer Lucas, and Katriuk's lawyers Orest Rudzik and Woychyshyn.

In an interview with The CJN, Canadian Jewish Congress national director Jack Silverstone called Nadon's transcript comments, troubling, disturbing, and said that they would have been "better left unsaid."

But he was reluctant to explicitly come out in favor of Nadon's withdrawal from the case, saying that he would rely on the judicial process to deal with the issue of Nadon's alleged bias.

At the same time, CJC is considering whether to seek intervenor status in the Court of Appeal, in support of Narvey's continued bid to acquire the same status on the question of bias.

Narvey's representations in Court have been made on behalf of himself and a coalition of seven Montreal-area synagogues, the "Coalition of Concerned Congregations," where he is its legal researcher and chief operating officer.

Saskatoon shul gets new rabbi

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

SASKATOON — Rabbi Steven Kaplan, new spiritual leader of Congregation Agudas Israel, the city's only synagogue, would like to make a difference.

"Of all the interviews I had, this community seemed to be the warmest, and the one where I felt I could have the biggest impact," Rabbi Kaplan says.

"I am at the point in my life where just working for a paycheque doesn't do it for me anymore. I have nothing to prove. I want to focus on why I am doing what I am doing. This community seemed to be the perfect setting."

Rabbi Kaplan, originally from New York, has been based in Florida for the past 20 years where he was a teacher and author. His fourth book, Healing the Distressed, A Jewish Approach was released last summer.

"I felt it was time for me to move back into a synagogue setting. The first thing I have to do now is get to know my new community and its needs. Several people have already expressed a desire for more Jewish learning and spirituality."

Montreal building designated historic site

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A century-old building that once came close to the wrecker's ball is now officially a place of common heritage for francophone and Jewish Montrealers keen on preserving their language and culture.

The Monument National at 1182 St. Lawrence Blvd. has been declared a site of national historic and architectural significance by the federal government in recognition of the important role it played in promoting both French and Yiddish.

At a recent ceremony, a plaque was unveiled at the Monument commemorating the fact that "this centre of theatre, political action and education has played a critical role in the promotion of the French language and culture in North America.

"Its theatre, which seated over 1,400, was also the centre of Yiddish performance in Canada between 1915 and 1957."

The plaque will be hung permanently in the lobby of the Monument, now the home of the National Theatre School of Canada.

French, Yiddish

Representatives of both the Société St. Jean Baptiste (SSJB) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) were present for the occasion, sharing memories of what this building meant for their communities.

Built by the SSJB and opened on June 24, 1893, the Monument was the nationalist organization's first permanent headquarters and home to various French-Canadian political, labor and educational groups over the years. But it was as a performing arts centre that the Monument became famous and its continuity was assured.

From 1896 until the late 1950s, it was the scene of Quebec musical theatre and other popular entertainment. Gracing its stage were some of the major international performers of the time as well, from Edith Piaf and Ludmilla Pitoeff to Yiddish stars Molly Picon and Maurice Schwartz.

"The Monument National has always occupied a unique and special place in the hearts and souls and memory of the Montreal Jewish community," CJC Quebec chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard said.

"First and foremost, it was the home of Yiddish theatre in Quebec for over 60 years, and many of our most treasured and enduring institutions are also rooted here."

The Hebrew Philanthropic Society, the Baron de Hirsch Institute and the YM-YWHA were housed at one time in the Monument.

Inaugural plenary

she said. The inaugural plenary of CJC in 1919, which assembled over 200 Jewish leaders from across the country, was held at the Monument, which was located in the heart of the Jewish immigrant district.

From 1903 to the mid-30s, the High Holy Days were observed by many Jews who didn't have a synagogue, at the Monument.

David Ben-Gurion, who would become Israel's first prime minister, addressed the community in the Monument on several occasions.

"From their arrival in the new world, our ancestors quickly felt the need to reproduce a part of their cultural and community life in Quebec," and the Monument National became a focal point for such activity, Howard said.

Switching to Yiddish, she said: "We found a home here, we stayed here and we're still here today."

While the heyday of Yiddish theatre at the Monument may have been from 1915-57, its presence there, both for local and touring companies, was much longer. The first Yiddish production was the Jewish King Lear in February 1897 and the last show went on in 1964.

Amid the Monument's pantheon of bronze busts, visitors can find one of Louis-Leiser Mitnick, Yiddish actor and impresario, alongside those of French stage actor Julien Daoust and feminist militant Idola St. Jean.

"The Monument National will always symbolize the historic, cultural and human ties that are woven between the Jewish community and the whole of Quebec society," Howard said.

SSJB Montreal president Guy Bouthillier recalled that the Monument was where the most eloquent proponents of Quebec nationalism and sovereignty found a forum, as well as other social activists and intellectuals, among them Isaac Bashevis Singer and Marek Halter.

The Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada describes the imposing four-storey structure as "a splendid expression of late 19th-century eclectic architecture...reminiscent of certain palaces of the Italian High Renaissance."

However, the building was rundown and facing demolition in 1970. Since the early 1950s, the Monument had been losing prestige. The area had become crime-ridden and patrons stayed away, but the National Theatre School was desperate to save it.

The SSJB tried unsuccessfully a couple of times to sell it. Then, at the last moment, the late Arthur Gelber of Toronto, a governor of the National Theatre School, intervened and bought the Monument in 1971 for $350,000 for the school.

"If it had not been for this gesture, we would not be here today," said Monique Mercure, the school's artistic director. Gelber, who was represented at the ceremony by his daughter Patricia Rubin, allowed the school to use the building for seven years, at which time it bought it back.

In the early '90s with subsidies from the federal and provincial governments, the Monument was extensively renovated and reopened with its original splendor restored on its 100th anniversary – June 24, 1993.

Vancouver organizations merge, join Federation

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), Pacific region, has joined with three other Vancouver-based Jewish community organizations to form the Israel Experience Centre (IEC).

The IEC, to be directed by Tracy Ames, will be run as a department of the federation. It represents the combined efforts of CZF, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV), the Aliyah and Israel Program Centre and Habonim-DROR.

Drew Staffenberg, JFGV executive director, says, "The merger with CZF allows Federation to beef up the Israel component of our mandate. The primary goal of the IEC joint venture is to increase the number of young people visiting Israel on a wide variety of organized programs.

"Bringing all the Israel-related programs under one roof will allow us to reduce costs and make [programs] more effective," he said.

IEC will offer a host of Israel programs, including the annual high school debate; elementary school public speaking contest; Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration; Yom Hazikaron program; the annual Walk With Israel; Habonim-DROR Kibbutz and Aliyah programs; the Gift of Israel project; the March of the Living; and Partnership 2000.

Staffenberg said JFGV and CZF have enjoyed "a good working relationship" over the years.

He said the two organizations worked together to provide scholarships for youth trips to Israel, and have also been partners in the annual Walk With Israel.

JFGV president Jonathan Berkowitz said the establishment of the IEC as a department of Federation represents a natural step in the evolution of the Lower Mainland Jewish community. "When the Vancouver Jewish community became federated in 1986, Federation was structured in such a way that it assumed responsibility for only some of the Israel-related programs. Now, with the establishment of the IEC, the connection between Vancouver and Israel will be enhanced."

The IEC is receiving some financial support from CZF's Canadian head office in Toronto. Most financing for the coming fiscal year comes from a one-year allocation approved by JFGV's board of directors.

The IEC is currently using CZF's office space in the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver (JCC).

"It's the sign of a mature community when everybody is working together towards a common goal," Berkowitz said.

Ottawa JNF honoree fought in Haganah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Local businessman Moshe Feig was the honoree at Jewish National Fund of Ottawa's (JNF) Negev Dinner held recently at Agudath Israel Congregation.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who co-chaired the dinner with Rabbi Arnold Fine, compared Feig to astronaut John Glenn, who was "known by many as a hero of space. Moshe Feig, for his many contributions to the Jewish homeland, could be said to be a hero of sacred space...of the land of Israel."

Barbara Farber, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir, said that Feig, "in his own quiet way is a tower of knowledge and of quiet giving."

Feig, a Holocaust survivor, was born in Satmar, Romania. After the war, he joined the Jewish Brigade and set out for Palestine.

He fought with the Haganah during the War of Independence, in a religious unit known as the Alexandroni Brigade.

Feig has requested that the funds raised in the Negev Dinner campaign be directed toward the building of a rest area situated close to the memorial for those soldiers.

"We take great pride that you have chosen to honor your fallen comrades and use JNF as a vehicle for this," said national president of JNF Canada, Naomi Frankenburg.

"It would be right to count among the founding fathers of the state all those who participated in the battles for the homeland. One of these soldiers is Moshe Feig," said Israel ambassador to Canada David Sultan.

Following a cantorial concert by Cantor Yaacov Motzen, accompanied by Stephen Glass, a plaque was presented to Feig by Dr. Norman Barwin, president of JNF Ottawa.

Author compares bestseller's thesis to Jewish thought

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The thesis of the bestseller Men are From Mars, Women are From Venus, by John Gray, is consistent with Jewish thought, says an American psychologist and author.

"The Talmud tells us that the first human was both male and female. When separated, the two different souls were to complement each other so that when united, they would be greater than the sum of their parts," Dr. Lisa Aiken said.

Aiken was the keynote speaker at Jewish Woman of the 21st Century: 5000 Years In The Making, a women's conference held recently at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The conference, which attracted about 50 women, was organized by the Collaborative Group for Jewish Women, with proceeds going to the Women's Division of the Combined Jewish Appeal.

"Gray contends that women are inclined to talk things through, while men are more apt to withdraw to their 'caves' to solve problems.

"The Torah points this out in the names that were chosen for the first man and woman. Adam, when separated into its two syllables, means one who is silent, while Chava is taken from the Aramaic word for conversation."

Gray insists, Aiken said, that men wear "uniforms" – such as tzitzit, kippot, tallit and tfillin – to define their roles, while women have no need of uniforms as they successfully juggle multiple roles.

Aiken suggested that the Jewish laws of taharat hamishpachah or family purity allow women space and time to replenish their emotional reserves, coinciding with Gray's thesis that women function as "waves" who give unsparingly until depleted, and then need to fill up again.

He describes men as rubber bands who alternately come close then pull away in relationships.

In another talk, Aiken credited the laws of family purity with creating the time needed "to restore one's sense of integration with God."

As a result, she said, a couple develops non-physical means of communication, which in turn, deepens the satisfaction and spiritual fulfilment of their physical relationship.

Other conference programs included a talk about the genetic risk of breast cancer, and workshops about the mitzvot of women, symbolism in the Jewish wedding, coping with illness and disease, and Jewish Survival.

There were also displays exhibiting features of a Jewish home, including hands-on challah baking.

LETTER OF APPRECIATION

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently sent a letter of appreciation to those involved in Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations. Lindan Toole (far left) was thanked for producing the gala event at the CNE; Julia Koschitzky (holding letter) for chairing the city-wide celebrations; and Karen Morton for chairing the CNE event. Joining them was Israel's consul general, Jehudi Kinar. [D. Gordon photo]

Kedma serves needs of Orthodox students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Maury Kelman

TORONTO — Orthodox Jewish students on Toronto and Montreal campuses now have an organization geared to their specific needs.

Kedma, the brainchild of Toronto native, Rabbi Maury Kelman, was started in Israel two years ago and now has a presence in Canada, the United States (where it is continuing the activities of the organization Kiruv), England and France. A Kedma shabbaton was held this weekend in Montreal.

Rabbi Kelman, who moved to Israel in 1992, returned to Toronto last year to study law at Osgoode Hall.

He started Kedma to serve an estimated 1,500 to 2,000 observant North American students spending a year at yeshiva in Israel.

Ambassadors of Judaism

"The idea was to, basically, develop leaders who will be a source of Kiddush Hashem (sanctification of God's name)," he said. The independent, non-profit organization is apolitical, he added.

Programs focus on leadership training and social action. "Our mission is to strengthen observant students."

Most of the students in Israel, he noted, attend secular universities on their return home and haven't necessarily been in a non-Jewish or non-observant environment before.

Young men wearing kippot or young women in long skirts "will be seen as ambassadors of Judaism. How [will they] deal with that?"

Some of the programs he initiated in Israel included role playing and discussion "in an open, tolerant way," as well as social action programs like quarterly blood drives and an annual bone marrow drive held in conjunction with the Toronto one in memory of Audey Stanleigh.

Kedma's role includes preparing students for outreach to other Jews who may have negative stereotypes about the Orthodox – perhaps by extending a Shabbat invitation, offering to study together or talking informally about a Jewish issue.

"The object is to show Judaism and Orthodoxy in a positive light. One of [our] main principles is to sanctify God's name," he said. Kedma encourages students to do volunteer work and to be positive role models by living according to their principles, without being condescending.

While Kedma only became an official partner of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) in September, Rabbi Kelman ran a couple of programs here last year.

A day-long conference on comparative law (Jewish and secular) was co-hosted by Kedma and Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz Congregation in May.

Many of the non-observant attendees were shocked to find that they'd been under misconceptions about Jewish law, he said.

Kedma Israel now has a staff of five, who run the organization in Rabbi Kelman's absence.

In Toronto, Rabbi Kelman is running classes on the weekly Torah portion and contemporary Jewish issues out of York University's Jewish Student Federation. "The idea is to create learning programs, discussion groups on contemporary issues like pluralism and conversion, and trying to be a Kiddush Hashem." There's also a social aspect, he noted.

Lance Davis, JCS' director of education, serves as Kedma director in Toronto. Rabbi Kelman is chair of the international organization. The partnership arrangement with JCS – which is paralleled by the Conservative group Koach and the Reform movement's Kesher – is unique for Kedma, Rabbi Kelman said.

In the United States, by comparison, the New York-based group works with individual rabbis and synagogues to serve a variety of campuses.

Upcoming plans include the creation of a continent-wide student board. "Our goal is to make Kedma a student-run organization."

Kedma has filled a large gap in Toronto, said JCS' Davis. Regarding the separate denominational campus groups, "the idea is not to segregate communities, but to provide welcoming and safe gateways to bring the entire Jewish community together."

Sharon proposes return of Palestinian refugees

By AKIVA ELDAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon has recently been touting a revolutionary new plan for preventing a deadlock in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The plan includes full territorial contiguity for the Palestinians, return of the 1967 refugees to the West Bank, and a two-track process with one devoted to security issues and one focused on "humanitarian and economic" issues aimed at improving Palestinian living conditions in the territories.

In his six-page English-language plan called Security and Coexistence: an alternative approach to the deadlock between Israel and the Palestinians, Sharon says that "the unflagging struggle for peace must be central to all our considerations," and that "the Middle East is in the midst of a conventional and non-conventional arms race, and as a country that absorbs immigrants and faces heavy social, economic and humanitarian problems, Israel is not interested in taking part in this race."

In the document, which Sharon has used recently in presenting his views about the region to various groups, he says, "It is possible to reach an interim agreement which is a kind of non-belligerency agreement. This will enable the Palestinians to keep the Oslo agreement, and Israel will get the time it needs to test and see that conditions are ripe for a true, lasting peace."

Emphasizing that "this alternative approach of avoiding crises, a concept of the agreement as 'less than peace' must be considered a position of retreat: if at any stage in the negotiations it becomes clear that the effort to reach a final status agreement has failed, the Israelis and Palestinians could adopt this approach, as a way of breaking the deadlock and reviving the peace process."

In the introduction, Sharon writes: "Fifty years after the establishment of the state, the political landscape of the Middle East is still characterized by hostility, hatred and suspicion. At the most basic levels, the Palestinians and Arabs have not fully accepted the presence of a non-Arab, non-Muslim state like Israel, in their midst ... Do we really have to wait for this attitude to change?" Sharon asks.

"I don't believe so," he replies. "An unflagging effort to reach peace should be the principle guiding all our judgments."

U.S. urges Israel to ratify Wye

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — U.S. officials have urged Israel and the Palestinian Authority to move ahead with the Wye agreement, despite a spate of terrorist attacks aimed at derailing the peace process.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright telephoned Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat last Friday, after a suicide bombing at Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market wounded at least 21 Israelis. The two suicide bombers were the only fatalities.

She reportedly appealed to them not to let the enemies of peace derail implementation of the Wye Accord, which calls for Israel to transfer 13 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinians in exchange for concrete actions against terrorism.

The Israeli Cabinet, which was in session last Friday when the suicide bombers struck, immediately suspended its deliberations on the accord.

The Cabinet later issued a statement that it would ratify the agreement only after the Palestinian Authority fulfils its security obligations under the accord.

Just the same, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai predicted the Cabinet would convene in the coming days to resume discussion of the agreement.

At a weekend rally, Netanyahu announced that Israel would continue to build in Jerusalem, including Har Choma. The start of infrastructure work in March 1997 at the controversial site in southeastern Jerusalem prompted a deadlock in the negotiations with the Palestinians that lasted 18 months.

Machane Yehuda was the site of a terrorist attack in July 1997, when two suicide bombers claimed 16 victims and wounded 170 others.

Russian Parliament fails to censure extremist

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The lower house of Russia's Parliament is facing accusations that it fuelled anti-Semitism by rejecting a resolution criticizing a Communist lawmaker for anti-Jewish remarks he made last month.

President Boris Yeltsin criticized the Duma, saying he was indignant at the rejection of the motion to censure Gen. Albert Makashov, who recently said, among other things, that "it is time to expel all Yids from Russia."

"Extremism will not take the upper hand in Russia," Yeltsin said in a statement.

In fact, Makashov is not alone in blaming the Jews for Russia's economic hardships. Anti-Jewish banners were evident at two rallies that drew 20,000 people last weekend to mark the 81st anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution.

The rejected motion, which did not criticize Makashov directly, said his comments were "harsh and bordering on rude" and had provoked concern across society. It fell far short of receiving the 226 votes it would have needed for passage in the Duma.

Pyotr Shelisch, a Jewish member of the Duma, said it was "important that the vote did take place, showing where the Communists stand" on the issue of anti-Semitism.

Boris Berezovsky, a Jewish tycoon, went so far as to call for the banning of the Communist party, the main opposition party in the Parliament.

The debate in the Duma received unusually extensive coverage in the Russian mass media.

One television channel, NTV, called Nov. 5 a black day for Russian Communists who showed their worth when they "trampled on multi-ethnic Russia."

In Washington, the National Conference on Soviet Jewry (NCSJ) commended Yeltsin for his remarks, but also called for further action.

"It is time to look for ways to make fundamental changes in how the Russian people and Russian leadership think of their fellow Jewish citizens," Mark Levin, executive director of the NCSJ, said in a telephone interview. "Now is the time to dig out the root of systemic anti-Semitism that exists in Russia. It needs to be addressed before it gets out of hand."

Russian state prosecutors had said they were considering bringing criminal charges against Makashov, and the Communists had said they would dissociate themselves from his statements.

But attempts by authorities to prosecute Makashov over his remarks have stalled. As a Duma deputy, he enjoys immunity from prosecution and can only be stripped of this by the chamber.

And the Communists appear to have reneged on their earlier promise.

Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov tried to limit the damage caused by the affair by saying that Makashov had been issued a reprimand by the party. But Zyuganov also said in an interview last week that if some Jews are insulted by Makashov's remarks, Communists are ready to take part in a "Russian-Jewish dialogue" that should also involve "numerous facts" of humiliation and insults to the Russian people.

Other hard-line legislators also defended Makashov. Another Communist lawmaker, Yuri Chunkov, said that many people in his native Siberia share the views expressed by Makashov. And Vassily Shandybin, a Communist representing central Russia, said all Jews are to blame even when a single Jew acts as a "traitor."

Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the leader of the Liberal Democratic party, chimed in by saying that the remarks were understandable given the hardships experienced by the Russian people.

For his part, Makashov said the issue was not one of anti-Semitism. He said that by using the word Yids, he meant to attack Zionism, which is a "threat to Russia."

Some analysts suggested that the issue could damage the future electoral chances of the Communist party.

High court backs pluralism

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In a decision that advances the cause of religious pluralism in Israel, the High Court of Justice has ordered three Israeli cities to appoint Reform and Conservative representatives to local religious councils.

Along with the ruling regarding Tel Aviv, Haifa and Arad, the court called on a government committee that oversees the contentious issue to resolve pending challenges regarding the religious councils of Jerusalem and the northern community of Kiryat Tivon.

In its ruling, the 13-justice panel established a general criterion for membership on the local councils – that the representatives not be anti-religious.

The participation of non-Orthodox representatives on the councils has been hotly debated in the courts for more than two years.

The local religious councils, supervised by the Religious Affairs Ministry, have exclusive jurisdiction over marriage, kashrut, burial and other religious matters for all Jews living in Israel. Members of each council are appointed by the local municipal council, the religious affairs minister and the local chief rabbi.

Rabbi Uri Regev, head of the Movement for Progressive Judaism in Israel, as the Reform movement in Israel is known, termed the latest ruling an "important stepping stone" that builds on a ruling last year which opened the way for the appointment of a Reform representative to the Netanya religious council.

But Orthodox representatives challenged the ruling, questioning how it would be possible for a religious council to operate if its members possessed varying degrees of religious observance.

"Regarding Haifa, the question was not whether Conservative, Reform and Orthodox could sit together on a council. We consider such categorizing artificial," Haifa's chief rabbi, Rabbi Sha'ar Yishuv Cohen, told Israel Radio.

"If the council includes members who openly say they do not observe kashrut and keep the Sabbath, then the religious councils, whose function is to provide religious services, such as kashrut certification, cannot accomplish their tasks."

The Week in Israel

Nov. 2

• Yasser Arafat agreed to a request by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to postpone the start of the Wye Accord, which was to take effect today.

• Israel lifted restrictions imposed in September on the entry of Palestinian workers. The number of entry permits for laborers was increased from 47,000 to 60,000. Israel also allows entry to 21,000 Palestinian merchants.

Nov. 3

• President Ezer Weizman assured Cyprus that relations between the two Mediterranean countries would not be affected by Israel's increased military ties to Turkey.

Nov. 4

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubenstein said the government plans to indict a former undercover agent for failing to prevent the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Although Avishai Raviv did not know the precise plan for the murder, he did know of Yigal Amir's intention to assassinate Rabin.

Nov. 5

• A law that would force Israeli radio stations to devote at least half of their music air time to Israeli songs passed first reading in the Knesset. The bill is intended to "erect a protective wall" around Israeli music against the "onslaught" of foreign influences.

• Israel announced it will send medical supplies, medical teams and agricultural teams to help the victims of Hurricane Mitch.

• Israel attacked suspected Hezbollah targets in south Lebanon in retaliation for a roadside bomb that killed three members of the South Lebanese Army.

Nov. 6

• The cabinet suspended talks on ratifying the Wye accord following the suicide car-bomb attack in Machane Yehuda. Hamas claimed credit for the attack. It appeared that only the two bombers were killed. More than 20 people, however, were hurt.

• Israel's population passed the six million mark. The population grew by one million during the past seven years. Of the total figure, 4.76 million are Jewish.

Islamic Jihad sent bombers to market small group of right-wing extremists arrived at the site promptly and tried to incite the crowd.

These extremists are almost always on hand in the aftermath of a Palestinian terror attack. Machane Yehuda, a bastion of the capital's right wing, is considered a friendly area for them.

This time, however, the chants of "Bibi is a failure!" and "Ka-hana!" were almost immediately hushed by market vendors who hurried to restore business to normal, at least partially. "Shut up, you trash!" one vendor shouted at a youth, who screamed for "death to the Arabs."

Surprised by the reaction, the boy and his friends tried again: "Death to the traitors, death to the Arabs." But to no avail.

"Nobody here says anything against Bibi," said a vegetable vendor. "Nobody here is going to exploit a terrorist attack for political gain."

The Kahanists, supporters of the outlawed extremist movement Kach, looked helpless and lost. They hoped to find a stormy and furious market following the attack, but instead found that some of the rage was aimed at them. Even the police acted determinately against the instigators, some of whom they know well.

Within several minutes, three of the inciters were arrested and the others dispersed. One of the three was remanded to custody while the other two were released on bail.

The flow of shoppers after the Friday morning attack was light, but a trickle of market-goers continued to arrive – especially to the stands farther from the site of the blast.

Another indication that vendors were trying to restore business to normal was that, unlike previous times, not everybody sent their Arab workers home, despite the concern that they would be lynched by an angry mob. A few Arab workers could be spotted in the market during the day.

Those vendors who did not close their stands at 10 a.m. insisted on ending the day "with something," according to pastry vendor Golan Levy. "Life goes on no matter what," he said, "especially on a Friday."

Another vendor added, "It will be tough, but peace will continue. We can't go back. The government knows what it's doing. Bibi and Arik [Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon] are not stupid."

About three hours after the incident, Jaffa Street reopened to traffic. Several hours after the attack there were reports of two incidents in which Palestinians were hurt by Jews who threw stones at them.

List of Nazi-era looters found

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The World Jewish Congress (WJC) announced Friday it has found a list of 2,000 people involved in the Nazi looting of art during World War II, and planned to make the list public as early as this week.

The WJC said its researchers found the list during a search through recently declassified documents in the U.S. National Archives.

The list was compiled by the Art Looting Investigations Unit of the Office of Strategic Services, which later became the Central Intelligence Agency.

The Nazi looting of art was unprecedented in history and according to Francis Taylor, the director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the total value of the stolen art in 1945 was about $2.5 billion at wartime prices – or more than the total value of all the art in the United States.

A WJC spokesperson said the group plans to make the list public as early as next week in connection with the opening of a State Department conference at the end of this month on the restitution of Holocaust-era assets.

The list of names will be accompanied by a biographical index. The spokesperson said that the names on the list include people from Germany, Austria, France, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Sweden and Luxembourg. Some of the most prominent art dealers in Europe are included.

Sharon's new plan

While noting that "Judea and Samaria are the cradle of the Jewish people…and no country would give up territory and its historic roots," he says, "Israel has agreed to compromise and to make concessions in order to reach peace."

Therefore, Sharon suggests a plan of his own to advance the peace process. The plan includes the following key points:

• Efforts must be made to avoid crises in the negotiations;

• Israel must do all in its power to improve the daily life and living conditions of the Palestinians;

• Israel must stick to its strategic defence needs, including security zones;

• Israel must make its positions clear as to what it can and cannot do.

Sharon proposes advancing the negotiations on two parallel tracks. The first would be the diplomatic track and deal with border security, mutual territorial agreements and other elements. The second track would be humanitarian and economic and would deal with improving the economic climate, providing incentives, creating mutual trust and more.

Italy struggles with memory of anti-Jewish era

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Sixty years ago, fascist Italy enacted anti-Semitic legislation that led the way to the Holocaust in this country. Italy's public authorities and the country's Jewish community are marking the anniversary with a series of commemorations, conferences, publications and other activities.

They are aimed both at memorializing the Jews who were persecuted as well as condemning the anti-Semitic policy of the fascist state.

But they also are directed at examining the behavior of most mainstream Italians who did little to protest or combat the racist laws.

"I'll never forget the indifference," recalls Tullia Zevi, until recently the longtime president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities. "It was bitter. Nobody took a stand."

The fascist government of dictator Benito Mussolini passed the first of a series of anti-Semitic laws on Sept. 2, 1938. The laws were fully in place on Nov. 17, 1938 and affected more than 48,000 people.

They barred Jews from public life and subjected them to a wide range of humiliating restrictions and persecution.

Among other things, they barred Jewish students and teachers from public schools and universities. They barred Jews from marrying non-Jews, from working in a long list of professions, from serving in the army, from employing Christian servants, from staying in hotels, vacationing at resorts and placing classified ads in newspapers.

Thousands of Jews fled the country, including talented intellectuals and scientists, such as Rita Levi Montalcini, who won the Nobel Prize for Medicine in 1986.

The racist laws were a particular shock for Italy's highly acculturated Jews. Unlike the case in Nazi Germany, the laws came with relatively little warning and more or less reversed the prior policy of the fascist regime.

Jews had been active participants in Italy's independence movement, the Risorgimento, in the 19th century, and most felt a profound sense of Italian identity.

A number of Jews were early supporters of Mussolini, and while many Jews were anti-fascist, thousands of Jews had joined the fascist party.

"The racist laws represented a deep wound, not just for the Jews, but for the country as a whole," the Milan Jewish magazine Il Bolletino said in its October issue. "For the first time, the united state constructed in the Risorgimento cut off a group of citizens who had participated, side by side with others, in the construction of that state."

Recalled Zevi, who was a teenager when the racist laws were imposed and fled Italy with her family to the United States: "From one day to the next, we became nobodies, ghosts. It teaches you about the fragility of the human condition."

Indeed, part of the problem in looking back is the fact that many older Italians must confront their own behavior in the face of the persecutions.

Italy entered World War II as a Nazi ally and ended it on the side of the Allies. The Italian fascists arrested Jews and interned them in prisons and concentration camps, but Italian Jews were only deported to death camps after the Germans occupied Italy in 1943. About 8,000 Italian Jews were deported to their deaths.

Indeed, Italians have won praise for their role in helping Jews survive during the war.

As a result, there has been a tendency to "push the idea that attitudes of solidarity shown by many Italians during the German occupation, when Jews risked deportation, had actually begun as early as 1938," according to an article in the Milan newspaper Corriere della Sera.

A survey of the grandparents of students at a Milan secondary school, the article said, showed that many thought that Italian anti-Semitic laws were only introduced after the German occupation.

A 1995 poll of young Italians aged 16 to 24 showed that only little more than 38 percent knew that Italy had ever imposed anti-Semitic laws.

The commemorations come at a time when renewed interest in the history of World War II is coupled both with a fading of memory and with debates over the true nature of Italian fascism and its legacy.

Pope Pius XII a saint?

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Israel's ambassador to the Vatican wants to delay plans to beatify Pope Pius XII.

Calling for a 50-year moratorium on plans to beatify the wartime pope, Aharon Lopez told reporters that haste in setting Pius XII on the road to sainthood would constitute a "very destabilizing element" in relations between Israel and the Vatican.

Critics accuse Pius XII of remaining silent in the face of the Holocaust.

The beatification process is the last step before someone is made a saint.

Lopez called on the Vatican to open its classified archives to let historians find out the full truth about Pius XII's wartime actions. Such archives, he noted, are usually kept secret for 70 years.

Lopez noted that "beatifications are the absolute prerogative of the church" and said he did not intend to pass judgement on Pius XII.

But, calling Pius a "controversial" figure, he added, "I think there should be a moratorium of about 50 years" on the beatification process in order to "dispel any doubts about Pius XII."

He also noted that "feelings are still high and wounds are still open from the tragedy of the Shoah."

In response to Lopez's remarks, a Vatican spokesperson said that the beatification process "would take its due course" and the Israeli position would have no effect.

Forgiveness for Inquision possible

ROME — Pope John Paul II has indicated that the Vatican may ask forgiveness for the Inquisition as part of a policy of self-searching as the Christian millennium approaches.

The Pope said last week that the Inquisition belonged to a "tormented" phase of the history of the Roman Catholic Church, and he noted that he had already called upon the faithful to reflect deeply and sincerely on this period.

But, he said, the church could not ask for pardon based only on emotionally charged public opinion.

"Only when historical science has managed to establish the true facts can theologians and ecclesiastical authorities express an objectively based judgment," the Pope said.

The Pope was addressing several dozen international historians, scholars and other experts on the Inquisition who had met for three days behind closed doors at the Vatican.

The symposium was the church's first official examination of what many regard as the darkest chapter of its history.

It was held as part of the Vatican's preparations for the year 2000. Pope John Paul wants the church to begin its new millennium by owning up to, and repenting for past sins.

The Inquisition was set up in the 13th century as a permanent tribunal charged with rooting out and combating heresy. It lasted into the 19th century and became notorious for brutal methods that included the interrogation, imprisonment, torture and burning at the stake of many thousands of people.

French Jews put Holocaust education ahead of restitution

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Leaders of the French Jewish community have asked the World Jewish Congress (WJC) for moderation as it pursues Holocaust restitution in France.

Educating the French people about their wartime past takes priority over monetary reparations, the community's president said during a recent meeting in New York.

"We know you want to help us," said Henri Hajdenberg. "We thank you for your help and your support, but you have to understand – it's a French problem."

The appeal comes as the WJC prepares to negotiate payment of Holocaust-era claims with 15 countries, including France, on behalf of Jewish victims and their heirs.

Some critics have maintained that the WJC was too strong-handed in its efforts to wrest a settlement from Swiss banks, and that this posture contributed to an anti-Semitic backlash in that country.

Others have defended the WJC, saying the recent $1.25 billion (US) Swiss settlement would never have been reached without the group's persistent pressure.

The call for moderation from French Jewish leaders reflects fears that too aggressive an approach in their country would only fuel the right wing, which has attracted 15 to 20 percent of the French vote in recent elections.

Noted Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld, a member of the French delegation meeting with the WJC here, also cited the "deep roots of anti-Semitism in France," punctuated by the Dreyfus Affair of 100 years ago and the Vichy government of World War II.

"We have to deal with that complex situation," said Klarsfeld, who is one of four Jews sitting on a nine-member, French government commission that will inventory assets looted from Jews living in France during the war.

The commission is expected to present a final report of its findings in December 1999.

The French Jewish community's objective concerning material restitution, Hajdenberg said, is threefold:

- to inventory bank accounts, money and possessions taken from Jews deported from France;
- to ensure that heirs of foreign Jews living in France who were deported receive restitution; and
- to make sure that stolen artworks are returned to their rightful Jewish owners or their survivors.

Company's success attributed to versatility

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

When Irving and Debbie Estein launched I.D. Fashion Ltd. 20 years ago, they ran their fledgling women's apparel company from the basement of their home.

Today, the Winnipeg-based company is the exclusive North American manufacturer of the label L.A. Seat Covers and employs 70 people in its 30,000-square-feet headquarters at 100 Adelaide St.

"We grew quickly," Debbie Estein said in a recent telephone interview. "When we moved into this building, we occupied one floor then a second. We kept growing and finally we bought the building. Today we're spread out on four floors."

Estein attributes I.D. Fashion's success to the quality and versatility of the clothing line it has produced over the last two decades.

"The kind of product we manufacture was popular right away. It was a lucky break. Customers recognized the high quality right away."

The company specializes in "sophisticated" weekend wear, which she defined as unstructured clothing in soft fabrics with elasticized waists for comfort.

"Quality and fit are the strengths of the line," she said. "These are our priorities... Most of our product is pre-washed. We eliminate shrinkage and we offer soft fabrics that are easy to care for."

Estein said the clothing is so versatile that, with the right accessories, it can be worn at the office or other less casual venues.

The outfits also have a "youthful look that appeals to women of all ages," she added.

The company produces both a winter and summer line. The winter wear, which is in stores now, uses a variety of fabrics, like velour, and polar fleece, while a soft woven cotton is used extensively in the summer line, Estein said.

She said one of the most popular selections is a ribbed velour grouping in purple, brown, black, and chartreuse. Leggings or pull on pants are paired with a box style-single breasted blazer or a zippered tunic-length top with a flower treatment on the pull of the zipper.

Another big seller, she said, is a polar fleece group which is available in solid black as well as a geometric print in melon and light turquoise with black accents.

The polar fleece straight-leg pants, which are ribbed at the drawstring waist for comfort, can be coordinated with several matching tops: a long sleeve simple tunic, a hip-length vest with a zipper and Chinese collar, a big shirt with buttons or a long sleeve shirt with a drawstring waist and a wind collar (a zippered collar that can be worn up or down).

Psst... Hey guys wanna buy ladies' underwear?

By JOSEPH SERGE
Supplements Editor

A month ago I was invited to a Jack and Jill wedding shower. What made the whole thing rather stressful was that it was a "lingerie-themed" shower, meaning I was supposed to buy lingerie for the bride-to-be.

So armed with the bride's bra-size (which I surreptitiously obtained from her sister, not by copping a feel and guessing), I headed over to the nearest super mall and trepidatiously entered a place I'd only heard wonderful stories about – La Senza.

Within seconds I began to feel like I'd rather be on the battlefield in Stalingrad – "anywhere but here."

First off, the huge posters of young women wearing only their undies was a bit discomforting. You know, it's like those old Russian icons that keep staring at you no matter where you move.

As I began fiddling about with the lacy bras on display, looking for a size 30C, I felt – I knew – that every woman in the store was looking at me (and wouldn't you know it, the store was packed, although I could swear it was empty when I walked in). I knew exactly what they were thinking – and it wasn't nice.

Temperature rising, sweat falling, I aborted the bra idea and moved on to teddies. (Panties were right out!) But now I faced a dilemma. Cup size wasn't the only thing I had to know here, and I'm a horrible guesser when it comes to S, M, L, XL.

A store clerk, half my age, soon approached me. "Can I help you?" I looked at her and then at all the women who turned to look at me. I swear the girl in the poster beside me shifted her pose, perhaps to hear my answer.

My hands started shaking. I felt like a teenage boy caught by a store clerk looking at Penthouse. I mumbled something incoherently and dashed out the store to a Home Depot, where, amidst the power drills and hammers, I felt safe.

Laurence Lewin, president of La Senza, has some advice for men trying to buy underwear for a woman. "The expression of love, like the selection of lingerie, can be a minefield or a masterpiece," he says. "There's always the question of interpretation when you're building bridges from Mars to Venus. That's why you've got to get your message right."

So here, direct from the horse's mouth, is A Martian's Guide to Venus.

There are three questions to consider when buying lingerie for a woman, the first being: What message are you trying to send?

Basically, Lewin says, there are three choices. If your gift were a greeting card, what would the message say?

- "I love you" or "I want you?"
- "Please wear this for me," or "Here's something to keep you warm;" or
- "Let's watch Jay Leno together" or "Let's rent 9 1/2 weeks."

The second major question: What's her style?

- Is she ultra-modern, favoring non-frilly, un-fussy clothing? If this is the case you're in luck. This is a banner year for classic satins and silks with sleek, uncluttered lines.

Success attributed to firm's versatility

The polar fleece tops can be can be accessorized with a mock turtle neck in 100 percent cotton, which comes in solid colors to match the colors of the print.

Another product grouping is called "crush and plush," in which two textured fabrics are designed to be matched together – one has the appearance and sheen of crushed velvet, while the other fabric is thicker and less luminous.

"This grouping has a real holiday feel and a less casual look," Estein said. "It comes in a beautiful chocolate brown, jade green, burgundy, and black."

Leggings and pull on pants can be paired with a long tunic with deep side slits or a baseball-style hip length long sleeve cardigan with a V-neck and buttoned front.

L.A. Seat Covers are available in small to extra large, she said. "We also do a petite block for stores that specialize in petite and a tall block made to the specifications of the Tall Girls shops."

Dresses are a growing part of the market and are included in every grouping except the polar fleece. The style is loose-fitting with a gathered or A-line skirt with, or without, a button front. The dresses come in knee and ankle lengths.

A-line skirts with elastic waists in these two lengths are available with most L.A. Seat Cover groupings, Estein, added.

The company manufactures much of the fabric used in the clothing – the velours and double-knits – she said, noting that her husband takes care of financing and fabric production, while she's in charge of production and design.

Estein said the company acquired the Canadian rights to the California-based L.A. Seat Covers about 15 years ago. But because the U.S. company no longer exists, I.D. Fashion is now the line's exclusive North American manufacturer.

Recently I.D. expanded into the United States, she said. "A year ago ColdWater Creek – a mail order business with a huge catalogue distribution across the U.S. and Canada – became a major customer."

The L.A. Seat Cover line can be found at Tall Girl shops across Canada, in Vancouver at Petit Fashions, in Regina at The Dressing Room and Under Rhaps, and in other stores in major Canadian cities.

How to buy lingerie for your special friend

• Is she romantic and tactile? A lover of dinner by candlelight? For her, consider gifts with the sensual softness of velour – in styles ranging from crushed panné mini-nighties, to luscious full-length robes.

• Does she revel in the glamor of getting really dressed up? Chances are she'll love the luxury of a full-length Jean Harlow-style satin nightgown with thigh-high slit and matching faux fur-trimmed robe. Or a slinky red satin nightie with glittering rhinestone straps.

•Is she drop-dead sexy? In this case hot peek-a-boo fashions in daring translucent mesh with embroidery, snakeskin-printed or naughty stretch lace. Plus the perennial favorite: lace-trimmed garter belts.

•Is she the playful 'little-girl" type? Look for cozy flannel pyjamas with Winnie-the-Pooh or Mickey Mouse prints. Or, like Ally McBeal, opt for the ultimate bedtime-story nightwear featuring fluffy sheep, big tailed squirrels or bundled-up teddy bears.

More often than not, Lewin says, "Women really want a lingerie wardrobe that offers a variety of choices depending on their mood."

Big help there!

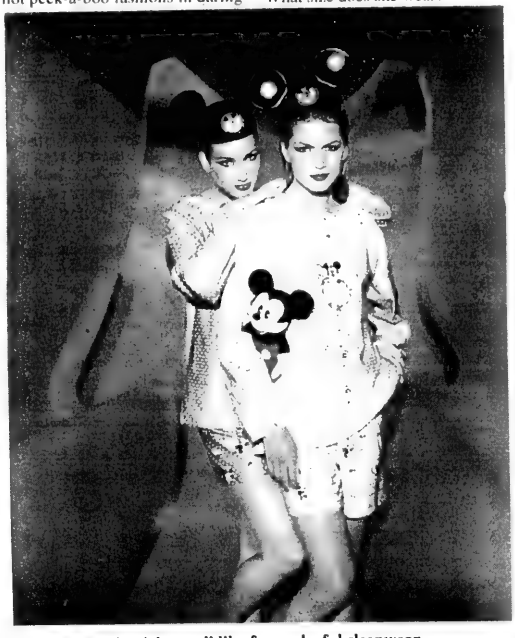
The final question to ponder: What size does she wear?

When in doubt, I was told, always opt for a larger size. At least you know she'll be able to get it on. If she notices that you've bought a bigger size than she usually wears, tell her the sales lady said the style "fits small." That way, she won't be offended or embarrassed if the larger size fits her perfectly.

"At La Senza we reduce the risk for gift givers by discreetly sealing your sales slip in a small envelope. You can slip it to her in case the gift needs to be returned for another size," he says.

For the record, I ended up getting her a nice bath robe. You can't go wrong there.

Joseph Serge only wears women's underwear "on special occasions" and never on Shabbat.



"Little-girl types" like fun, colorful sleepwear.

Izzy Camilleri Couture
Taking Fashion to a New Level

According to the Merriam-Webster Dictionary, couture is defined as the business of designing fashionable custom-made women's clothing. According to designer Izzy Camilleri, couture is the opportunity to launch an exciting new fashion concept.

Izzy Camilleri's career began at the mere age of nine, when her mother taught her how to sew without using patterns. Creating clothes became a hobby of Izzy's, and not too much later it became a profession. With the opening of Izzy Camilleri Couture, a full-service, custom clothing design house, Izzy takes fashion to the next level.

"I want to change some of the preconceptions women have about custom designed clothing and position couture as a viable alternative to retail shopping," says Izzy. While the idea of custom-made clothing is not new, the trend has been that women tend to have something made for a special occasion only. Izzy Camilleri Couture emphasizes custom-made production of any type of clothing from casual to business and evening.

"I think there are really two hurdles to overcome in terms of positioning couture clothing," says Izzy. "The first is that many women don't even know that the option exists and the second is the belief that it is expensive, time consuming and risky."

Draped front partially bias cut evening gown.

In order to simplify the entire couture process, Izzy has developed a formula geared to ensuring a positive experience. At the first appointment, Izzy will discuss the proposed project, design the item and take measurements. Then, the client can choose the fabric from the extensive assortment available at the studio. "I know that my clients are busy, so sending them to a fabric store seems incredibly inconvenient," says Izzy. The client will have one fitting and in most cases can pick up the completed garment a week later. Women may think that having clothing custom designed is more expensive than buying it in a store, but Izzy feels that customers will be surprised at how reasonable the cost can actually be. "To design a pair of wide leg cuffed trousers can cost approximately $100, not including fabric, which is probably the same or lower than what is found in the stores. A skirt can cost from $75 to $100, plus the cost of fabric, depending on the style. In most cases the entire project takes from one to two weeks, depending on the client's needs, but in an emergency a garment can be ready in 48 hours."

Izzy's credentials should convince potential clients that she can deliver on this formula. From 1984 to 1990, Izzy's career bloomed, as she designed unique leather and knit fashions that were shown at such high profile events as Fashion Cares, the Festival of Canadian Fashion, and even at a private showing for Prince Andrew and Sarah, the Duchess of York.

In the early nineties, the fashion industry began feeling the impact of the slowing economy. In a time when many designers suffered due to the recession, Izzy actually launched a new facet of her career when a friend asked her to create the wardrobe for a film she was working on. Word of mouth brought a flood of work in the movie and television industry. Soon Izzy had produced costumes for such stars as Nicole Kidman, Nicholas Cage, David Bowie, Mira Sorvino, Holly Hunter, and Kareem Abdul Jabbar. Today, Izzy's wardrobing business employs a staff of seven.

Semi-fitted evening suit

While the wardrobing business continues to thrive, Izzy felt it was time for a new challenge and developed Izzy Camilleri Couture. "This new venture really is a logical next step. It combines my experience as fashion designer with my experience in wardrobe production." Her goal is to make women excited about the couture concept. "There are so many aspects to couture clothing that make sense for women," says Izzy. "They can have that incredible suit they saw in a magazine that isn't available here. They don't have to scour stores looking for the perfect leather jeans, and they can replace their favourite pair of pants that have worn out. They can bring me a picture, or even an idea, and I can design and produce exactly what they want." Achieving the proper fit and adjusting current fashion trends to take into account real women's bodies is of course one of the major advantages of custom designed clothing. "We are used to making clothes for actresses that aren't even in town by taking measurements over the phone, so creating clothes that fit is one of our areas of expertise," says Izzy.

Izzy Camilleri Couture is located at 207 Adelaide Street East, Suite 204. For an appointment, please call (416) 860-0783.

Saga Furs launches new Gaultier line

A collection of furs for men and women created by French couturier Jean-Paul Gaultier, in cooperation with Saga Furs of Scandinavia, made its North American debut on the runway at the annual North American Fur & Fashion Exhibition in Montreal (NAFFEM) this spring.

Gaultier's collection is indicative of Saga's mission – to get talented designers interested in using fur in new ways.

The styles included a unique twist on the bolero, one for women in red Saga fox, and one, for men, in Saga silver fox.

A full-length, reversible Saga mink coat for women has special seaming and embroidery, while an urban remake of an Inuit style coat combines fox with astrakahn.

For men, Gaultier has created a French, nautical-style striped pullover in Saga mink – a design that is classic, whimsical Gaultier. A belted kimono coat for women in black mink rounds out the small but diverse collection.

Fur is making inroads in menswear this year. The fall '98 European menswear collections showed trimmed and whole fur coats for men in contemporary, avant-garde and classic styles. In Paris, Milan and New York, designers discovered that fur suited their individual styles and hit the right note for autumn.

Steve Gold, Saga Furs of Scandinavia's North American representative, addressed NAFFEM representatives at the Montreal show. Gold regularly attends the designer collections in Europe and the United States.

He has also been the architect of Saga's highly successful, ongoing American Designer initiative. The program has encouraged over 40 distinguished fashion designers to use fur in their ready-to-wear collections.

The North American Fur and Fashion Design Competition award panel singled out four Canadians for their spectacular work.

Two top honors went to three former trainees of the Saga International Design Centre: gold medalist Angela Bucaro ('94, winner of $10,000; and silver medalists Mariouche Gagne ('93) and Veronique Miljkovitch ('93), winners of $7,000 each. All three are from Montreal. The two silver awards are given courtesy of Martin Cauchon, secretary of state for Canada Economic Development.

Torontonian David Dixon won a bronze medal and a $3,000 cash prize.

The North American Fur & Fashion design Competition is organized by the Fur Council of Canada, with the support of Canada Economic Development.

Nose job: Woman turns her passion for scents into a business

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to the CJN

Blending her keen sense of smell, great intuition and a dramatic flare, Marian Bendeth, started Sixth Scents, a unique consulting company dedicated to fragrance education.

Bendeth's fascination with fragrance began when her grandmother presented her with a bottle of 4711 at the age of three. "I became obsessed with the smell," she said. "By the age of five I had saved my pocket money and was able to purchase a miniature bottle of L'Air du Temps. When I was 11, I owned over 25 perfume bottles. My taste in fragrance had become very sophisticated."

Bendeth's passion for perfume turned from a hobby to a vocation when working at a public relations firm in the 1980s. "My boss gave an excellent presentation to two potential clients, both men. When she left the room, one of the men commented that he couldn't work around her smell and promptly went to another agency. Overhearing this conversation, I took the liberty of assisting her with regard to appropriate fragrances for her future presentations."

This experience led Bendeth to her present career as a fragrance specialist, first as a promotional assistant and demonstrator with a number of stores in Toronto. By 1989, Bendeth formed Sixth Scents offering her talents to the general public and the fragrance industry.

Bendeth, listed in Who's Who of Canadian Women in 1997, 98 and 99 operates a multi-faceted business. Within the perfume field, Bendeth advises fragrance distributors on viability of importing products, evaluates perfumers' creations, conducts seminars, guests on television shows and writes articles.

Bendeth's in-store demonstrations are often requested by many retailers including The Bay, Sears and Eatons. She is currently negotiating to return to her birth place, London, England to ply her knowledge at one of the most prestigious department stores in the world.

As an independent, unbiased source, Bendeth is often called upon by the major perfume houses to launch their scents. Her commissioned endorsements have included Parfums Boucheron, Jean Paul Gaultier, Lalique Parfums and Lanvin Parfums.

In October, Bendeth was invited on a fragrance expedition of France under the auspices of the French trade Commission and CFME ACTIM – the agency for International Promotion of French Technology and Trade with the French Parfumery Federation. She visited essential oil houses and met with perfumers.

A highlight of her trip was being invited to the home of Loris Azzaro for tea. The couturier whose name adorns a bevy of fragrances delighted in testing her ability to sniff out the ingredients of his favorite scents. She was thrilled, yet slightly embarrassed when he insisted on calling her "Le Nez" (the nose).

"No," she protested. "A nose is a genius who creates perfume. It's like someone saying you are an artist when you are an art critic."

An integral part of Sixth Scents' business is personalized fragrance wardrobing. "It involves an all over fragrance education," she says. "This consultation involves interpreting the perfumer's work, the consumer taste and ultimately, their body chemistry and motivation in purchasing. What separates me from everybody else is that I become the liaison between your nose and your body."

Bendeth, a self-taught perfume expert, prides herself on her close working relationships with biochemists, neurologists, psychologists, perfumers and fragrance technicians. She brings over 30 years of experience to her consultations.

Bendeth does not sell products and as an independent consultant, she doesn't receive an industry fee for suggesting a particular scent to her clients. She makes recommendations from an array of over 600 fragrances supplied by over 36 distributors.

"I reserve the right to guide my client in the direction they like. I am totally consumer driven."

Bendeth charges $75 for a 90-minute session. The client leaves with a package that includes a personal profile, product information and sample vials, if in stock.

Canada, Israel sign interim aviation agreement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel air dispute is over, at least for the time being.

Representatives of the two countries last week agreed to an interim arrangement that regulates air traffic between the two countries pending negotiation of a permanent pact.

During that time, El Al will continue its schedule of flights to Israel, while Air Canada will remove from its winter schedule one of its planned weekly departures to the Jewish state.

"I'm glad the issue has been resolved by a compromise and not by conflict," said David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

Air Canada had planned to offer five departures per week to Israel during the winter season, which runs from late October to March 28, but under terms of the interim agreement it will be limited to four weekly departures between Jan. 11 and March 28. Prior to Jan. 11, it will be allowed to offer five weekly flights.

El Al, for its part, will offer departures to Israel on three days per week during the winter season and upgrade that to four during the summer, said Moshe Shamai, the airline's Canadian manager.

Shamai said "El Al is happy with the interim agreement. It's a compromise."

John Hamilton, spokesperson for Air Canada, said the airline was asked by the government of Canada to drop one of its flights from its winter schedule. The carrier will eliminate one flight from Montreal to Tel Aviv during that period. He declined to comment on the agreement, saying it was an issue between nations.

Hamilton said the Canada-Israel route "is fairly strong for us" and that Air Canada was hoping for it to grow. The airline plans to offer seven flights per week to Israel when the winter season ends, he added.

The dispute began when Israel gave notice it was terminating the aviation agreement after Air Canada announced it was adding two flights to Israel during the winter season, bringing the weekly number to five.

El Al is unhappy with the aviation agreement, which was signed in 1985 and which had become obsolete, Shamai said. One example he cites is a term that compels El Al to balance its departures for Israel between Toronto and Montreal, even though Toronto has become a much larger market. A more contentious issue is El Al's concern that Air Canada is operating a North American-wide service to Israel, using Toronto and Montreal as "hubs" through which it is ferrying American passengers to Israel. It need not fill its aircraft with Canadian passengers. That effects El Al's North American business to Israel, Shamai said.

Hamilton agreed that Air Canada is using its Toronto and Montreal centres as hubs "to funnel American passengers overseas, whether it's to Asia, Israel or Europe. That's a huge growth strategy for us."

American passengers are attracted to Air Canada by the lower prices (because of the cost of the Canadian dollar) and because it is a shorter route, Hamilton said.

In other developments, El Al announced that its Montreal-bound flights from Tel Aviv will now land in Mirabel Airport and not Dorval. The change kicked in on Nov. 1. El Al will continue to depart for Israel from Dorval.

Shamai said noise abatement policy in Israel, which prohibits departures between 2 a.m. and 5:30 a.m., and regulations in Dorval that forbid arrivals before 7 a.m. led to the change in scheduling. El Al will provide free transportation into Montreal and to Dorval for passengers arriving at Mirabel in the early morning.

El Al implemented two discount fare programs on Nov. 1, Shamai added. The "Bar Mitzvah Special" offers a 50 percent ticket reduction for 13-year-olds traveling with both parents to Israel to celebrate a bar mitzvah.

The "Visiting Your Child Special" offers parents a 20 percent discount if they both travel to Israel to visit a child studying in Israel for a year, provided the child has flown to Israel via El Al, Shamai said.

Israel Today episodes attract 50,000 viewers

By JAMES L. PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With six shows completed, the weekly television newsmagazine Israel Today, is off to an impressive start.

Israel Today, hosted by Howard Adelman, 60, covers a wide range of topics affecting Israel, often with a Canadian angle.

Planning for the show began more than two years ago when Adelman was approached by representatives of the Christian evangelical organization 100 Huntley Street.

As part of its general television license application to establish Crossroads Television System, the organization wanted a television show on Israel.

Israel Today is commited to 26 shows, running until March 1999. The one-hour Monday night show (9:30 p.m EST) is pretaped at the Crossroads Burlington studio, where most filming is done.

Adelman works with a limited budget of $4,500.00 per show, and Crossroads provides the studio, the crew and all technical support.

The show is a comprehensive examination of the various issues that affect Israel, the Palestinians and the Middle East in general.

With regular tie-ins to Canada, topics cover the peace process, tourism, the Palestinians, the Israeli constitution, doing business in Israel and Israeli culture.

The one-hour format, which includes commercials, is round table in nature with guests being interviewed by Adelman.

He feels that if the show succeeds, and Crossroads is still required under its licence agreement to offer balanced programming, then the show is likely to run past its initial commitment.

In a recent Neilson Media Research ratings report, it was indicated that up to 50,000 people are watching the show, a large proportion of which are non-Jews.

Syndication possible

Crossroads organizers told Adelman that the show could get syndicated "if we get good, and if it's economical...but it's a little too early."

Israel Today is only one of several commitments Adelman has on the go. The professor of philosophy at York University and chair of the Harry Crowe memorial lecture series, has written or edited dozens of pieces on refugee issues around the world, the Arab-Israeli conflict and other matters.

Between 1980 and 1996, he was the recipient of 57 grants to study and run conferences in areas of general academia, refugee matters and children's issues.

Things go 'boom' in The Siege

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Edward Zwick's taut, fast-moving thriller, The Siege, deals with a sickeningly familiar subject – Arab terrorism.

In this instance, however, the bombs do not explode with fireball intensity in Tel Aviv or Beirut, but in New York City.

On second thought, this is hardly a far-fetched premise, given the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Centre in the heart of Manhattan, an event which introduced Americans to Middle Eastern terrorism.

The Siege, which has flashes of a documentary style, opens with a bang as a band of American agents kidnap a sheik in a desert somewhere in the Arab world.

From there, the focus shifts to Brooklyn, where a series of terrorist incidents throw New York City into fear and chaos. A bus explodes, killing many passengers. A school is held hostage by a terrorist. Bombs level a Broadway theatre as well as the headquarters of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's terrorism task force, causing hundreds of fatalities.

In desperation, the president of the United States declares martial law and calls in the army to police Brooklyn, the lair of the terrorist cells responsible for the mayhem. Scores of Arabs are rounded up, sparking civil rights marches.

The film turns on four characters: Anthony Hubbard (Denzel Washington), who heads the FBI force hunting the elusive terrorists; Frank Haddad (Tony Shalhoub), his Lebanese-American partner whose son is picked up in the dragnet; Elise Kraft (Annette Bening), the pesky and shadowy Central Intelligence Agency operative who has ambiguous links to one of the Palestinian suspects; and William Devereaux (Bruce Willis), the thoughtful but brutal general who imposes order on Brooklyn.

In a movie like this, where the villains are Muslims, it is easy to leave an impression that Arabs are by definition terrorists. The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee has in fact claimed that The Siege is anti-Arab, a tissue of incendiary stereotypes.

I beg to differ.

In The Siege, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, Zwick is careful to distinguish between Arab perpetrators and law-abiding Arab citizens. He does not brand all Arabs with the same broad brush. In one scene, an Arab-American community spokesperson declares that Arabs completely support efforts by the FBI to track down the terrorists.

And lest this be insufficient a disclaimer, Zwick goes to lengths to state that Islam as a religion does not promote, encourage or sanction terrorism.

Distinguished by uniformly fine performances, The Siege is never unduly sensational. And in only one case, a shoot-out with a den of terrorists, is there a hint of gratuitous violence.

If nothing else, The Siege identifies a major problem afflicting the world today, and does so without tarring Muslims or Arabs.

Bruce Willis (foreground) plays a general in The Siege.

Film explores the heart of darkness

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

American History X is a fiercely intense profile of a racist skinhead, as well as a journey into the heart of darkness of neo-Nazi youth culture.

Tony Kaye's edgy film, set in Venice Beach, Calif., normally a refuge of sun worshippers, beach bums and wide-eyed tourists, unfolds against the savage backdrop of inter-racial tension and violence.

Addressing such pertinent social and political issues as minority crime, multiculturalism and affirmative action, the movie is shot largely in black and white for greater effect.

Composed of a series of interlocking flashbacks that coalesce into a stunning finale, it leaves a viewer transfixed.

American History X turns on Derek Vinyard (Edward Norton), a scowling skinhead leader who ultimately renounces his hate-mongering views. Before he undergoes this transformation, he murders two black men in a spasm of white supremacist rage.

Having reformed himself, thanks in part to a charismatic black man who was once his high school history teacher, Vinyard tries to save his impressionable younger brother, Daniel (Edward Furlong), from a similar fate.

The film, which extracts an astonishing performance from Norton and credible performances from the rest of the cast, opens on a chilling note as Vinyard, a bold swastika on his chest, slays two black thieves who are about to break into his parked car. Vinyard is a formidable adversary, intelligent and calculating, and his brother looks up to him. But his mother (Beverely D'Angelo), a widow, and his sister, a dyed-in-the-wool liberal, despise his bigoted attitudes.

ARIEL DORFMAN SPEAKS HIS MIND

One of the outstanding sessions of the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors had to be radio host Eleanor Wachtel's rivetting interview with Argentinean-born author Ariel Dorfman, who now lives in North Carolina.

"Can everyone hear Ariel?" Wachtel asked at the start, to which Dorfman replied, "Yes, and I hope Pinochet can hear me, too."

A Chilean citizen in exile since the 1970s, Dorfman was outspoken in his criticism of Chile's former despot, and Chile's weak-kneed response to his possible extradition from Britain to Spain to face war-crimes charges.

He castigated the Chilean government for attempting to whitewash Pinochet's atrocious record of human rights abuses.

Dorfman also spoke about his dual identity involving the Spanish and English languages and cultures. His parents brought him to the United States before he was 3 years old, and he spoke only English during his American childhood. His tongue reclaimed its native Spanish only after the family was exiled back to South America in the McCarthy era.

In a newly published memoir, Heading South, Looking North: A Bilingual Journey (Farrar, Strauss and Giroux), Dorfman discusses the various exiles that shaped his identity.

As he explained, his family has endured exiles and upheavals long before three of his grandparents emigrated from Eastern Europe about 1900. "My mother's father was killed in a pogrom in Kishinev in 1905," he said. "I think I grew up with terror in my blood."

Wachtel's interview with Dorfman will likely be broadcast on her popular weekly show Writers and Company on CBC radio some time in the winter.

A highlight of this year's festival was the rare appearance by southern Ontario writer Alice Munro who read from her newest book of short stories The Love of A Good Woman (McClelland and Stewart). Several days later, Munro received the $25,000 Giller literary prize for fiction at a gala ceremony in Toronto. (The prestigious award was founded several years ago by businessman Jack Rabinovitch in honor of his late wife, literary journalist Doris Giller.)

In previous years, Israeli authors have been well represented at the Harbourfront festival. But for the past two seasons, none have been included – an omission that director Greg Gatenby will hopefully amend for next year.

As Wachtel demonstrated with her radio series on Israeli writers earlier this year, there's no shortage of worthy candidates.

Yiddish Sayings: The Friends of Yiddish and the Committee for Yiddish of UJA/Federation present Catching Arrows – Translating Yiddish Folk Sayings, a lecture by Toronto writer-translator Shirley Kumove, a lively tour of the origins and translation of Yiddish folk sayings, rhymes and word plays. Yiddish Song: The Morris Winchevsky School, assisted by the Label Basman Memorial Scholarship Fund, presents a concert by Claire Klein Osipov, an acclaimed soprano specializing in Yiddish song, and accompanist Wendy Bross Stuart. The duo, joined by percussionist Martin Fisk, perform selections from their latest CD, Sing to Me in Yiddish, Volume II. Nov. 15 & 16, 7:30 p.m. $18 ($15 in advance). Reservations recommended. 789-5502.

Poetry Reading: Montreal poet Robyn Sarah, whose latest book of poetry Questions About the Stars was published recently by Brick Books, gives a reading Nov. 15, 7:30 p.m. at Monaco's Restaurant, 107 George St. E., Hamilton. She reads again (with several other authors) Nov. 18, 8 p.m. at the Art Bar, Imperial Public Library, 54 Dundas St. E., Toronto. 461-5657.

In The Spotlight: With hundreds of devoted acolytes crowding the stage, and obviously grooving on his every nasally intoned word, poet-visionary-singer Robert Zimmerman, a.k.a. Bob Dylan, gave a relatively "warm" performance recently at Toronto's Maple Leaf Gardens. That's saying a lot for Dylan, who's been known to mumble indifferently through concerts, leaving audiences cold.

Mixing songs from the many phases of his career, the legendary folksinger touched on most of the eternal themes of his work – war protest, personal salvation, freedom, romantic love. He opened with You Gotta Serve Somebody, a religious song from his "Christian period." And what a mean harmonica he blew in such nostalgic numbers as My Back Pages and the bitter love ditty It Ain't Me Babe.

The 16 songs he and his band played ran the gamut from his earliest days (Blowin' In The Wind) to his latest Grammy-winning album Time Out Of Mind (four songs). Between numbers the stage would revert to pitch dark, leaving observers unsure which incarnation of himself Dylan would next rouse like a spirit out of the blackness.

Joni Mitchell, another icon of the Woodstock generation, performed a full set before Dylan's arrival, easily proving what a gifted poet and composer she is. All in all, 'twas one of the most memorable evenings this reviewer has spent in a hockey arena in a long while.

New Jacobovici film premiere

TORONTO — Last year documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici set out to solve a 2000- year-old mystery.

He was determined to find the 10 lost tribes of Israel by using the historical information in the Bible to trace their fate.

The results of his search is documented in his latest film, Quest for the Lost Tribes of Israel, which premiers at a gala screening on Nov 22, 7 p.m. at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre. The gala is presented by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre.

" Quest takes viewers on an unforgettable adventure to some of the most remote and exotic places on earth in search of a prophecy," Jacobovici, a two time Emmy-Award winner, told the The CJN recently.

" In this film you see the unfolding of prophecy."

Jacobovici, who will be on hand at the gala to answer questions predicts that the film will spark a heated debate.

Most historians say the 10 lost tribes assimilated when they were dispersed 2,700 years ago, however, he claims his film proves them wrong.

Tickets are $36, admission and includes a reception. $180 includes a tax receipt and post film gala. To order call 416-781-3584.

ANTIQUES AND OLD HOMES ON VIEW IN PORT HOPE

Port Hope, an attractive lakefront town an hour's drive east of Toronto, has much to offer travellers who stray (either by accident or design) from nearby Highway 401.

With a picturesque main street known for its antique shops, the town of roughly 12,000 is a haven for antique shoppers. The city also offers numerous heritage sites, including a surprising inventory of century homes.

A hilly town with extensive ravines, Port Hope was incorporated as a city in 1834 after briefly considering and rejecting the name Toronto. Like "Muddy York" and nearby Cobourg, the town had high hopes of making something of itself. Indeed, from roughly the 1840s through the 1870s, its busy port and important rail connections to Lindsay, Peterborough and the north heralded an era of grandeur and promise.

Attracted by the area's cooler climate in summer, numerous wealthy American families from places like Rochester and Pittsburgh built impressive summer homes here, sometimes staffing them with dozens of servants. The town was regularly serviced by ferries across the lake from Rochester and other cities.

Port Hope was in its glory in the 1850s, a decade of economic optimism, and the 1860s. But after the timber trade collapsed in the 1870s, severely curtailing the shipping and railway industries, the town's moment in the sun was over.

Today Port Hope is filled with many architectural remembrances of its storied past. First-time visitors may experience some satisfaction upon reaching Walton Street, the well-preserved Victorian boulevard. The residential side streets likewise present a pleasingly old-fashioned and somewhat sleepy vision of civic orderliness.

The community has undergone a renaissance of heritage restorations since the late 1960s, and a walk or drive through town will inevitably turn up many gems.

The Bluestone, at 21 Dorset St. E., is an 1830s mansion sometimes called the city's most splendid house. Other noteworthy 19th-century structures include the St. Lawrence Hotel (87-97 Walton St.) and the Town Hall (56 Queen St.), both credited to Rochester architect Merwin Austin.

One of the town's most interesting early structures is the 2½-storey post-and-beam house by the lake (168 King St.) once known as the Seaman's Inn. The house, which was featured in Jane Urquhart's 1993 novel Away, presently functions as a bed-and-breakfast hotel called Canada House.

For years, 1822 was attributed as the year of its construction. But after proprietors Bogdan and Sue Malyczewsky acquired the property about 1976, they uncovered evidence that it was built considerably earlier. For instance, they discovered an 1815 sketch of the town from the water with the house clearly visible. Eventually, they found the journals of the home's original owner, town founder Elias Smith, which indicate a construction date of about 1801.

The Malyczewskys uncovered many relics during the course of renovations. Behind the mantel of an old fireplace, for instance, they found an 1840 money order for $1,000 drawn on an American bank. According to Bogdan Malyczewsky, the note would have had a current value of $250,000 (US).

Although possessing the low ceilings and small rooms that mark the property as authentic to its period, Canada House (905-885-6017) would be a worthwhile place to stay for anyone interested in local history or the renovation of a heritage home.

Other local historic dwellings include the Hillcrest Bed and Breakfast & Spa (905-885-7367), whose exterior is framed by Corinthian pillars. Hillcrest was built in the 1870s as the summer home of a wealthy Jewish family, the Schwartzes, from Pittsburgh; it features lovely grounds and good views of Lake Ontario.

Smaller but no less quaint, the Butternut Inn (905-885-4318 or [www.butternutinn.com]) was the former home of the Great Farini, a famous 19th-century aerialist known for his daring crossings above Niagara Falls.

With such a cornucopia of 19th-century architectural riches, it defies expectation that Port Hope also possesses at least one significant 20th-century architectural treasure. The Capitol Theatre is an atmospheric 1930s movie theatre at Queen and Walton Streets whose neatly restored interior resembles the courtyard of a Norman castle. Images of clouds and stars are projected onto the ceiling to evoke the illusion that patrons are seated outdoors.

For a full and excellent description of Port Hope's brick-and-mortar treasures, consult Going to Town: Architectural Walking Tours in Southern Ontario, by Katherine Ashenburg (Macfarlane Walter & Ross, 1996).

Disturbing film evokes the skinhead subculture

In a memorable scene, one of several in this film, Vinyard lashes out at his mother's genteel Jewish suitor (Elliott Gould), bringing down on him a torrent of epithets.

American History X, which is didactic at times, suggests that the skinhead movement is becoming increasingly organized on a national basis and is exploiting the power of the Internet. Kay also infers that the skinheads are not merely loose cannons, but rather the jagged instrument of older, far more seasoned professional racists.

Kay evokes the skinhead subculture with consummate skill, both at a raucous rock concert filled with Nazi regalia and in the bleak jail where Vinyard is briefly incarcerated. Vinyard's prison experience, which includes a brutal rape in a shower stall, finally opens his eyes to the corrosive, self-defeating nature of prejudice.

Unrelentingly graphic, American History X hammers home an important message, and does so with unerring style.

It is playing at the Cineplex Odeon chain.

Reports of elderly's memory loss said exaggerated

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reports of memory loss among the aged are greatly exaggerated, a research scientist told the inaugural Ada Starkman series sponsored by the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

There is no early demise of memory among seniors, said Dr. Gordon Wincour of Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute. "We can report more good news than bad news."

Memory is not a single entity and is affected by age in different ways, he told the audience of 300 in the Abe Posluns Auditorium.

Only 27 percent of memory loss could be attributed to aging in a study at Concordia University of World War II soldiers interviewed 50 years later, Wincour said.

Other factors were more important, he said, adding that "the brain is not immune to problems in other parts of the body.

"Why so many lose or feel that they are losing their memory is not so much that they are getting older, but what happens as we grow older. In younger years, we are more resilient."

Elderly widowers are notorious for neglecting their diets, and poor nutrition might affect their memory, he said.

"People who lead energetic lives do better on cognitive functions. There is not much we can do about biological aging, but it is encouraging to know we can do something about other health factors."

Only two of the seven types of memory he listed, long-term and episodic, are affected negatively by aging, he said.

Episodic memory, remembering personal experiences that occurred at a given time, is the most vulnerable to old age, Wincour said.

He cited a study which showed that during a 10-day period, only one of 10 older people forgot to dial a telephone answering service once a day, while eight of 10 younger people forgot to do so.

When someone in the audience asked why he started out to get something, only to forget what it was, Wincour said it was a normal experience. The scientist said his studies show that the context of memory is important and that one when returns to his own surroundings, the memory of what is needed returns.

For this reason, he said, the new Home for the Aged being built at Baycrest will have more space in its rooms for residents to bring in familiar things which will help their memory.

Writing things down in an organized and meaningful way and repeating them is a good way to remember things, said Dr. Angela Troyer, the director of the memory and aging program at Baycrest.

Keys, wallets, glasses and anything that is frequently misplaced should always be put in a designated place, she said.

Seventy percent of older people were able to remember things on an organized list, while the figure fell to 50 per cent when the list was not organized.

She illustrated this to the audience who could remember many more items on an organized list of groceries than on an unorganized one.

"It's a myth that writing things down is bad for your memory," Troyer said.

Unfortunately there are no miracle cures for memory and no pills which can be taken.

"Remember where you parked the car. Write the location down, focus on the details around you. It is easier to remember information that is repeated," she said.

Scanning of brain cells is an exciting area of research at the Rotman Institute, said associate scientist Dr. Fergus Craik, the moderator. "We are working on ways to rehabilitate memory."

Further research at Baycrest will lead to more tips on how to improve memory, Craik said.

In answer to a question on how to differentiate between forgetfulness and dementia, Troyer said it is normal to forget the name of an acquaintance, but not normal to forget the name of a spouse or close relative. It is also normal to forget the details of an incident, but not normal to forget the whole event.

In answer to another query, Wincour said we lose only four percent of brain cells due to aging.

This first Ada Starkman lecture was sponsored by the Beverley and Aaron Black family and the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary.

German right-wing extremism growing, says Jewish leader

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Right-wing extremism in Germany is growing, says Ignatz Bubis, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

In a speech delivered at Beth Tzedec Congregation recently, Bubis said that he is confident that the newly elected federal German chancellor, Gerhard Schroeder, will vigorously combat xenophobia and anti-Semitism, the hallmarks of ultra right-wing parties in Germany.

But right-wing radicalism is on a roll, he warned, noting that between 15 to 30 percent of Germans harbor latent anti-Semitic views.

A Holocaust survivor, Bubis estimated that upwards of 15 percent of Germany's electorate is sympathetic to the far right, even though extreme right-wing candidates failed to win a single parliamentary seat in the recent general election.

Bubis, who is also president of the European Jewish Congress, said that he was concerned by two recent trends in German society.

The first is the phenomenon of intellectual anti-Semitism, which he described as a dangerous development. Such intellectuals acknowledge Nazi crimes against humanity, but they wish to stop speaking about the past.

Concerned with recent trends

The second trend turns on the perception that younger Germans are reluctant to accept responsibility for Nazi atrocities, he claimed.

Bubis expressed satisfaction with the Schroeder government's support of compensation payments to former Jewish slave laborers exploited by German companies during World War II.

In a snapshot of German attitudes toward Jews, he said that the majority of Germans consider Jews living in Germany as strangers and foreigners. Yet the intermarriage rate between Jews and non-Jews hovers around 60 percent.

In mixed marriages, he disclosed, few of the Christian partners convert to Judaism.

Frowning upon such unions, Bubis declared, "We believe in integration, not assimilation."

Germany, he said, is currently home to approximately 75,000 registered Jews, of whom some 45,000 are from the former Soviet Union. Prior to the latest wave of Soviet Jews to Germany, which began in 1990, the Jewish population was officially 29,000.

Bubis praised the federal government for giving the newcomers financial help, and he refuted Israeli accusations that he and other communal leaders encourage Russian Jews to settle in Germany. "Once they're in Germany, our duty is to try to integrate them."

Ignatz Bubis

Most of these immigrants are ignorant of Judaism and of Jewish culture and history, he suggested. But within several years, they will play an influential role in community affairs, he predicted.

Tracing the history of German Jewry since the collapse of Nazism, Bubis said that today's Jewish community was founded mainly by Jews from eastern Europe.

Noting that the newest generation of Jews feels more at home in Germany, Bubis voiced pride at the fact that the Jewish community has built a viable network of institutions, schools and synagogues.

During a question-and-answer period, Bubis was asked why he had remained in Germany after the war. He replied that he was unable to explain his decision, even after more than five decades.

Answering another question from the floor, he admitted that he has not succeeded in stopping German arms sales to Iran.

Bubis' appearance was sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University, and Beth Tzedec Men's Club.

Hamilton's new cantor one of youngest in Canada

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Ben Silverberg, 23, Beth Jacob Congregation's new chazzan, may be one of Canada's youngest cantors.

Silverberg, a Toronto native, says he is beginning to feel at home here, now that his first big challenge, the High Holy Days services, is behind him.

During the services, he delighted the congregation with his singing, and involved the children in an impromptu choir.

The first meeting of the proposed Beth Jacob youth choir attracted almost 30 people. Silverberg says he hopes to "breathe some life into the synagogue."

Silverberg's father is Toronto cantor Michael Silverberg, who Ben says instilled in him the importance of a solid musical foundation.

It was at his bar mitzvah, when he not only chanted the Haftorah, but the whole service, that Silverberg discovered how much he loved singing.

At age 16, Silverberg began doing the High Holy Days overflow services at Adath Israel Synagogue, and by the time he was 18 or 19, "I thought truly that I could not spend a day without singing," he says.

At 19, while studying for his BA in Judaic studies at York University, he joined the Beth Tzedec Synagogue professional choir.

As well, under the auspices of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim, he studied with Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple and then with Cantor David Bagley, who remains a friend and mentor.

Ben Silverberg

He also studied voice with Gwen Little, formerly of the New York City Opera.

Although he loves opera, Silverberg says he has no operatic ambitions. "For me, singing has to have some Jewish content."

He has taught bar mitzvah students at Beth Tzedec and Pride of Israel synagogue, and worked as a volunteer with Alzheimer patients at Baycrest.

But most gratifying, he says, was teaching youngsters with learning disabilities such as dyslexia, attention deficit disorder and hyperactivity.

Health Canada issues drug warning

OTTAWA — Health Canada is advising Canadians not to use Apo-Prednisone 1-milligram tablets, since the drug they're taking may actually be from a bottle of another drug which was accidentally mislabelled by its manufacturer.

Apotex Inc. has advised Health Canada that a single bottle of 100 Apo-Prednisone 1-mg tablets (lot number CD230) actually contains the drug Apo-Prazo (prazosin hydrochloride).

It's possible that one or more such bottles may be in pharmacies, where the drug would be dispensed into prescription-size vials.

Symptoms associated with the inappropriate use of Apo-Prazo – prescribed for the treatment of hypertension – include dizziness, lightheadedness, fainting and sudden loss of consciousness. A dose of 5 mg or higher of Apo-Prazo in a person not requiring the drug may present a serious health hazard.

For those patients taking Apo-Prednisone – a widely used corticosteroid – Health Canada advises there should be no effects from missing a dose for a short period of time.

Both products are only available on prescription. Health Canada advises those taking Apo-Prednisone 1-mg tablets to check their prescription to ensure their pills are round, white tablets with APO/1 imprinted on one side.

If their tablets are diamond-shaped, white tablets with APO/P5 imprinted on one side, consumers should stop using them immediately and contact their physician. If unsure about their tablets, they should consult their pharmacist.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel and toe-loop spins don't exactly go hand in hand, but for the last few years, ex-Soviet skater Misha Shmerkin has put Israel on the world figure skating map with his exuberant performances and top-15 finishes.

Representative of the first generation of Israeli skaters, Shmerkin is at the tail end of his career, according to figure skating maven Fauna Mandel. Not to worry. Israel is producing a new crop of top notch, competitive figure skaters to take his place, she said.

Mandel, 23, recently returned from a three-month stint as a volunteer at the Canada Centre ice rink in Metulla, where she got a first-hand look at the Jewish state's budding ice stars.

Two sabras, Lior Hirsh, 19, and Kfir Nathan, 22, are exceptionally talented skaters who were developed right in the Jewish state, she said. Mandel, a figure skating coach in her native Cambridge, Ont., said Hirsh in particular is loaded with talent. He's consistent, able to land tough jumps, spin in full control and perform with lots of style.

Nathan matches Hirsh in style, flexibility and ability to spin but "his jumps aren't as consistent as Lior's." Both, however, "have the talent to represent Israel well on the international stage," she said.

Rounding out the scouting report are Naama Zilberman, a 16-year-old skater from Haifa, and a 13-year-old Russian-born girl, who she knows only as Lolita, but who is "fantastic," Mandel said.

Mandel spent lots of time "stroking" on the ice with the Israeli skaters though not attempting any jumps. She got to know them and other skaters by sharing with them a two-bedroom basement flat near the rink. It was all part of the Israel experience Mandel signed up for through the United Israel Appeal.

She and Esther Saraga, a volunteer from Toronto who helped run the Metulla hockey program, shared a room in the flat, while Hirsh and Zilberman shared another room. Nathan slept on the couch for two months. The five split domestic chores, though most of the culinary tasks fell on Nathan's shoulders.

It was like one big, happy family. Living with the others while working at the rink was a wonderful experience, she said.

The only negative for Mandel was that she wasn't given the opportunity to instruct the enthusiastic young Israelis in figure skating. Instead, she and other volunteers merely supervised public skating. Her only exposure to figure skating was the time she spent on the ice with the elite athletes.

For the dozens of Israeli ice munchkins who skate around the rink in their shorts and T-shirts, it was a lost opportunity. Mandel serves as a coach at the Hespeler Figure Skating Club and at the Preston Figure Skating Club in Cambridge, giving group and private lessons in freestyle, dance and general skills.

A graduate of the city's famed Preston Club, Mandel has performed in local and regional competitions, including the Grand River and Great Lakes events, and has advanced through the junior bronze level to senior silver.

"I was a good recreational kind of skater but I knew I wouldn't go on to the national camps," she said.

A visitor to Israel twice before, the Metulla experience gave her the opportunity to combine her love of skating with her devotion to Israel. It's a feeling shared by other young Canadians. At one point during the summer, there were eight Canucks serving as volunteers at Canada Centre, she said.

Coaches employ unique style

They divvied up their on ice activities in four-hour blocks. Down time was spent at the centre's pool, its workout room or on the basketball court.

Though somewhat disappointed that she couldn't instruct the young Israelis, her time in Metulla was a learning experience in its own right. In particular, watching the Russian-born coaches was illuminating, though sometimes "bizarre," she said.

Unlike Canadian coaches, the Europeans "kind of stand at the boards and yell their instruction, but their warmup exercises are amazing...They work a lot on footwork and spins. All the Israeli skaters are fantastic spinners."

Mandel was so impressed, she's employed some of those coaching techniques in the classes she gives in Cambridge.

Not exactly what she expected, but at least someone improved their knowledge of figure skating this past summer.

The Inside Back

My week at Camp Wye

By JORDAN MAX

By now, everyone knows the results of the Wye Plantation Summit – but for serious journalists like yours truly, the real story is the one behind the scenes, as detailed in Bibi's Last Laugh Diary, which I managed to acquire. Some excerpts:

Wednesday 14: Packed for Washington. Sara's adamant she needs to come along and do some shopping. Will tell Americans I need her by my side for policy advice. Yitz and Arik couldn't make flight since they couldn't get aisle seats. Hope they'll arrive Sunday. Flight not bad. Lots of policy discussions and final negotiation preparations. Schnitzel too greasy – heartburn. Movie was Armageddon. Remember to ask about whether our satellite is still in orbit when I return.

Thursday 15: Arrived Washington for opening news conference. Bill looks beat, kvetching that people want to impeach him or something. I tell him, me too, you just get used to it. For some reason, he got really upset when I offered him a box of stale cigars Yasser had given me. Maybe they're Cuban? Took helicopter ride to Wye Plantation. Sara excited to be seeing slaves. Tried to explain that slavery was abolished in America some time ago. She mentioned something about nannies, but I really was more focused on the summit. Met with the rest of the delegation.

Nicer accommodations than the Erez checkpoint, but the "boys" are fighting over who gets what bedroom. Had to mediate sleeping arrangements. Smaller building than Palestinians, but we have a better view of the security agents disguised as trees. Americans arranged for kosher kitchen. Hope they have lots of snacks. Opening joint session. Dinner was "Middle East" theme.

They call this felafel? More heartburn.

Friday 16: Not too much progress. Americans jamming our cell phone lines, can't call press or order pizza. Aharon Domb manages to unscramble them. Apparently he nearly bumped into P delegates at the Nike factory outlet. Beilin and Shitreet pop on over to give eitzes. Isn't this supposed to be a private summit? Settlers' representatives, who just happen to be in town, want to join us for Shabbes minyan. Americans don't want to admit them, also, refuse to allow sefer Torah in, claiming it might be bugged. The frum guys are really steamed. Where are Yitz and Arik when you need them? Americans won't let Sara's hairdresser in. Now, this is serious.

Cancel plans to attend Shabbat dinner with Bill and Yasser. That'll show them. Sara lit candles, Natan made kiddush. Dinner was fish of some kind with orange vegetables and twigs. Would have preferred chicken. In America they eat twigs now?

Motzei Shabbat 17: Met with settlers' representatives on lawn today, lounged around.

Americans "accidentally" turned off ovens. Nothing worse than cold cholent for lunch. Had good schluff, went for afternoon walk with Sara. She's still stewing about the nanny thing. Pretend to listen. Interdelegation soccer game, but Palestinians keep changing rules. No negotiations until after Havdalah. Tell Natan to make it really long. Americans not pleased. Tell them we've got Shabbat dishes to wash up first before talking.

Sunday 18: Yitz and Arik finally arrive. They get top bunks for being late. Time to get down to business. Some progress. Received word of Be'ersheva grenade attack. Decide to discuss only security issues. Agree to stay another couple of days, but running out of clean gotkes fast. Sara doesn't want to do laundry. Send her into town for more gotkes. Not the kind of shopping she was thinking of.

Monday/Tuesday 19/20: Lots of hard bargaining. Yasser insists on a full buffet for dinner, rather than the a la carte deal. Good thing Sara is by my side.

Wednesday 21: All night negotiations with Palestinians. Not how I envisioned spending my birthday. It's almost as bad as a Likud leadership convention, but not enough snacks. Yasser sends flowers, Sara gives me a Beanie Baby. Yasser still won't produce the working papers on security issues, Covenant guarantees as he promised. Am I surprised? Tell delegation to pack bags, we're leaving tonight. Tactics work, more snacks arrive. Unpack, for now.

Thursday 22: Yasser finally produces the papers he promised, agrees to change Covenant (again).

Deal is near. Americans want this wrapped up soon. I think the facilities are booked for some other convention and they don't want to pay for us to stay again over Shabbes.

Friday 23: Another all-nighter. Deal signed, but Americans seem really anxious to have us out, want to check for missing towels and ashtrays. Left it to embassy staff to split mini-bar bill.

Stay at embassy for Shabbes. Food much better, lots of snacks. Need sleep.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am a Grade 12 male student and my parents say that they want their children to be happy, well-rounded, well-adjusted and successful in their own eyes. I'm very involved in extracurricular life in school and out: sports, student council and two part-time jobs to pay for what my mother calls my "habit" (buying expensive clothes). I lead a busy social life but I am relatively responsible. I get repeated reminders that my only job in life is to get good grades in school. "Keep those grades up or everything else goes." I'm a better than average student overall but do worse in some subjects than others. It is my life and I resent the threat. Any suggestions?

Money Spender

Dear Money Spender,

It is very important to respect and obey your parents. It is also important to consider your parents' wishes but still retain your inner thoughts and dreams. Set your own limits so that your activities don't clash with your parents' expectations. Try adjusting your schedule to accommodate your needs as well as the wishes of your parents. By doing this, you will be able to maintain those extracurricular activities that you enjoy, as well as succeeding in your studies. Also, you will find that if you arrange you schedule in a different way, your social life will be easily accommodated. Maybe, instead of holding two jobs, you can limit what you spend on your wardrobe and hold one job. This will leave more time for you school work and your school involvement.

Your parents are not threatening you; they are just looking for ways to help shape your life and help you make the right decisions. All parents have great expectations for their children. You're at an age where you have to seriously consider your future career in life.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Zundel lawsuit includes PM

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel has launched a lawsuit naming Prime Minister Jean Chretien and the leaders of all parliamentary parties as defendants who allegedly deprived him of his constitutional right to free speech.

Zundel claims he suffered "humiliation, ridicule, hatred and contempt in the nation-wide media, and further damage to his reputation" as a result of a unanimous all-party resolution on June 5 to ban him from parliamentary precincts. He claims "the defendants treated [him] as a national pariah who should not be allowed into the precincts of parliament..."

Zundel names 18 defendants in his suit, including Canadian Jewish Congress and its president Moshe Ronen, the five parliamentary parties, each party leader and several other parliamentarians who took the lead in moving to bar him from the House.

He is claiming $250,000 in general damages from each defendant for violating his right to free speech, $250,000 from each defendant for conspiracy, $250,000 from each MP for "public misfeasance and abuse of office," and a further $500,000 in punitive damages from each defendant.

The events at the heart of the suit began on June 3 when Zundel announced he would host a June 5 news conference in the Centre Block's parliamentary press room to discuss a human rights case in which he is involved.

Ronen, who had been recently elected Congress president, got

GA kicks off in Jerusalem

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A "who's who" of Jewish North American and Israeli leadership is gathering in Jerusalem this week for a historic meeting of the UJA Federations of North America General Assembly (GA).

Held for the first time outside North America, the GA will bring together 3,000 delegates to celebrate the theme, "Many People, Many Roads, One Heart."

The conference is designed to allow Diaspora participants to "build personal relationships with Israelis, and to help Israelis build personal relationships with North Americans," said Sheldon Maerov, associate executive vice-president of UIA Federations and coordinator of the Canadian contingent.

Two hundred and twenty-eight Canadian delegates were expected to travel to Israel for the convention, 80 of them from Toronto.

Participants at the 67th GA were greeted with a crowded agenda.

Four key issues

By JULIUS GREY
Special to The CJN

Election Commentary

The election campaign in Quebec raises several issues.

The one most debated in the rest of the country is the Constitution. The Parti Québécois is openly sovereigntist, but is trying to downplay the degree of commitment to the cause.

For instance, Lucien Bouchard is raising the possibility of successful negotiation of an "in-between" status.

Jean Charest is clearly in favor of the constitutional status quo. His notions of decentralization are more connected with his conservatism and his acceptance of the Mike Harris/Ralph Klein model than with any traditional Quebec goals. He, too, is trying to obscure his position and to make it seem as though the status quo is unsatisfactory to him.

Clearly, both sovereignty and status quo are relatively unpopular with francophone Quebecers, and both parties find it necessary to disguise or obfuscate their program.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Town Crier To Apologize

TORONTO — The Town Crier newspaper will apologize for an anti-Semitic letter in a recent issue of its Beaches edition.

The letter, signed by Albert Coulls of Kingston Road, attacks Jews for pressuring the City of Toronto not to name a park after the late Joe McNulty, the popular Beaches resident who had been a member of the Swastika Club in the 1930s. The letter-writer admits to harboring "negative views" about Jews and suggests that that if Jews "do not like it here, you are free to leave."

Town Crier editor Andrew Gorm said the printing of the letter was "an error in judgment," and he pledged to publish an apology in the paper's next issue.

Muslims Protest Film

TORONTO — A coalition of Islamic groups held a press conference here last week to protest the stereotyping of Muslims and Arabs in the movie The Siege. The groups said the film unfairly portrays Arabs and Muslims as violent, and suggests that Islam is a potential threat to North America.

ISRAEL

Settlers Seek 'Footholds'

JERUSALEM — Jewish settlers have set up at least five new encampments in the West Bank since last month's signing of the Wye accord, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported. The moves came as part of an effort to establish footholds in the area before Israel embarks on any further redeployments.

Women Earn Less

JERUSALEM — Women working in Israel's civil service earn 25 percent less than their male counterparts, according to a survey presented to a Knesset member. The report says the discrepancy is due mainly to how overtime benefits are allotted, and it suggests closing all government offices at 5 p.m., a move it says would eliminate the benefit for both men and women.

Guidelines for Journalists

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority (PA) has issued guidelines for foreign journalists working in the self-rule areas. The guidelines, which in part call on journalists to obtain a licence, prompted concerns that the PA is trying to muzzle the media. Palestinian officials said they made the move to comply with the Wye agreement, which calls for a Palestinian crackdown on incitement.

WORLD

Kristallnacht Services

FRANKFURT — Germany's new chancellor and president were among the country's top officials attending one of hundreds of ceremonies in the country marking the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Proceedings Initiated

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department has initiated removal proceedings against an Indiana man who has been stripped of his citizenship for lying about his World War II service with a Nazi-sponsored killing unit in Lithuania and Byelorussia.

Kazys Ciurinskas, 80, served in a mobile killing unit that collaborated with the Nazis in the murder of Jews and others. In October 1941, the unit murdered more than 10,000 civilians in Byelorussia. A U.S. court found that Ciurinskas participated in at least one and most likely more than one such killing operation.

Family Seeks Asylum

SUVA, Fiji — A Jewish family is reportedly seeking refugee status in the Pacific island nation of Fiji. Yuri and Irina Yurovsky and their two children arrived in Fiji last December. They claim that their forcible return to their native Kazakhstan would result in persecution and possibly death.

Anti-Semitism Increasing

BERN — The debate over Swiss banks' wartime dealings with the Nazis has fuelled a wave of anti-Semitism in Switzerland, the country's human rights watchdog says. The Federal Commission Against Racism says that "latent anti-Semitism is again being increasingly expressed in public by word and by deed," adding that "comments from politicians helped make anti-Semitism socially acceptable."

Priest Attacks Jews

WARSAW — A Polish priest known for his anti-Semitic remarks has again attacked Jewish groups for objecting to the presence of crosses near the site of the Auschwitz concentration camp. Father Henryk Jankowski claimed that Jewish calls for the area around Auschwitz to be granted special status were reminiscent of Nazi demands on Poland. His latest outburst came at the end of a one-year ban on his preaching from the pulpit, which had been imposed for his earlier anti-Semitic comments.

Chassidic 'Robin Hood' Finally Captured

JERUSALEM — A rabbi dubbed "a chassidic Robin Hood" has been arrested in Israel in relation to a string of multi-million dollar frauds and robberies in Canada, the Netherlands and Britain.

The RCMP cooperated with Israeli officials in the arrest of Rabbi Joseph Pruschinowski outside the Jerusalem neighborhood where he lived. The 59-year-old father of 12 was sought by the Mounties, Scotland Yard, the FBI and Dutch police, and evaded arrest for a decade.

Over a 20 year period, the rabbi allegedly defrauded dozens of banks, commodity brokers and financial institutions to provide money for housing and charitable causes among unwitting chassidic communities.

Until a year ago, the RCMP had 10 outstanding warrants for Rabbi Pruschinowski's arrest, but they expired under a statute of limitations. While living near Montreal, he allegedly defrauded banks in Canada, Japan, Singapore and Australia. The rabbi fled Canada in 1987.

CJC worried over bill that would upgrade status of Bible college

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is trying to block an Ontario bill that would allow a Christian Bible college to grant recognized academic degrees.

CJC says the Canada Christian College and School of Graduate Theological Studies missionizes to Jews, and that its request to confer degrees should be rejected.

The college, which enrolls about 150 full- and part-time students, currently grants only diplomas.

CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy has written to Education Minister David Johnson, charging that a "primary focus" of the Toronto-based college is to convert Jews to Christianity.

Congress says a number of the college's faculty "have made a career of focussing on Jews for conversion." One of them is a "messianic rabbi," while two others are described as leaders in the messianic Jewish movement.

Of special interest to CJC is the college's Department of Jewish Studies. A syllabus openly states that one course will "enable the student to more effectively communicate and minister to the Jewish people."

Congress says "the targeting of the Jewish community for conversion by an educational entity must surely breach" provincial guidelines.

A similar controversy arose in 1991, when a CJN investigation found the college was apparently granting bachelors, masters and doctoral degrees, in contravention

Heroes recognized

Isser Adler, a survivor of Auschwitz, is 72 years old. An earnest man, without airs or pretensions, he walks with a deft and secure quickness. He always has time to ask how you are, and to smile at you his sweet, generous smile.

Last week, on November 9, Adler and some 180 others of his generation, were honored publicly at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto in a tribute to veterans of Israel's War of Independence.

The event was the largest gathering ever in Canada of the volunteers from overseas, machalnikim as they are acronymically known in Hebrew, mitnadvim m'chutz l'aretz, who served in the desperate1948 war.

Each of the veterans received a commemorative medal specially minted for the occasion. They travelled from across Canada to attend the event. Two of them were there in wheelchairs.

As Irving Abella, the evening's master of ceremonies told the large gathering, finally, 50 years after the birth of the young state these volunteers helped to bring into the world, they were receiving a long-overdue measure of public recognition and gratitude for their altruism and courage.

They were all heroes, and yet, typical of true heroism, they were all "ordinary" people too: all shapes, all sizes, some worn down by the years, others remarkably buoyed up by them, some religious, most seemingly not.

External differences were hardly significant however, against the deeper union of their shared experiences and their common commitment to the same cause, namely, that of the Jewish people.

Their courage and their heroism were inspirational. In the case of Isser Adler, his "story" inspired one of his sons, Yossi, and Yossi's wife Karen, to co-chair and to coordinate the commemorative event under the aegis of Mizrachi Bayit and Mizrachi Canada. Kenneth Stollon was Adler's co-chair.

It was an emotional, moving occasion, despite the fact, or perhaps because of the fact, that it was, essentially, free of the flourish, the fanfare and the "gala" flavor that often characterizes community evening events of this scale.

More than 500 people filled the social hall of the synagogue. There was barely any room to move. But that was actually part of the evening's poignancy. For, the families of the veterans were there to applaud, to hug and to kiss them. Children and grandchildren sat alongside their grandfathers and their grandmothers. Very few of the grandchildren restrained their expressions of pride and love towards their aged grandparents. And perhaps this, above all else, made the evening so touching.

Simcha Jacobovici, the award-winning film producer and documentarian, made the same observation in his keynote address. He was at the event however, not only as the keynote speaker but also to accept a medal on behalf of his late father.

Speaking in his deep, sonorous voice, and pointing to the large number of young children in the room, Jacobovici noted that "the entire miracle of Jewish survival" was embodied in the room that night. He meant it literally and metaphorically.

"I am touched by what is here and by what is not here," Jacobovici said.

He made the point that the room was filled with nearly 200 heroes from that history-making military campaign of 1948, and yet there were no displays of militarism.

"We prove ourselves in peace," Jacobovici intoned, "but we defend ourselves in war."

Looking directly at the veterans nearest to the podium, Jacobovici summed up the sense of joy and marvel that was palpable that evening in the room: "Thousands of years from now, people will be talking about your accomplishments. We thank you for what you did."

He spoke for everyone in the room.

On the very night that the veterans of Israel's War of Independence were being honored, many people across the world were commemorating the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht. November 9, 1938 was the night when the true nature of the Nazi evil was made manifest to the world.

One of our readers, Kurt Herzstein, sent us the following poem. Its pained, precise language evokes melancholy. I recommend it to our readers.

Kristallnacht:
A bitter reminiscence

Remember, remember,
The ninth of November,
Nineteen Hundred and Thirty Eight,
Make note of that date.

Alarm arouses,
They come from the street,
Invading houses,
With stomping feet
Pillaging, robbing,
Abducting men
When children are sobbing,
They are beaten then
They set on fire,
The holy places,
With grim desire,
And sneering faces.

The grieving dawn saw all the clashes,
The sacred parchments burnt to ashes,
The hallowed walls...a dying ember
.....remember.

Remember, remember,
The Ninth of November,
Nineteen Hundred and Thirty Eight
Remember the date.

NCJW breakfast club helps fight child poverty

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Our mandate is to fight child poverty, says Marcy Fish of National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Toronto section.

NCJW's child poverty committee, of which she is coordinator, put those words into action, with the establishment in September of a thrice-weekly breakfast club at a building affiliated with the Kehilla Residential Program (affordable housing under the auspices of UJA Federation). Eighty percent of the 111 units in the non-profit building are subsidized.

The breakfast club, a joint project with Circle of Care (formerly Senior Care), is co-chaired by Rachel Ornoy and Diane Shiner-Feder. They currently feed 15 to 20 children between the ages of 5 and 12 (of about 40 in the building) before the children leave for school.

In addition to nutritious food like French toast or scrambled eggs, unsweetened cereal and fresh fruit, snacks like yogourt or granola bars are available to take to school; board games and books are also there for their use.

"Besides being a breakfast program, it's an outlet for these kids to socialize. They talk to each other and they talk to us," said Fish.

"The program has impacted the building positively," confirmed Lisa Lipowitz of Kehilla.

Funding and some supplies have been provided by NCJW chapters and by individuals. Some food items are provided by Feed the Children's warehouse, but more is needed, said Fish. "We are paying exhorbitant prices for perishables."

Children who go to school without eating breakfast don't learn as well, she noted.

The program is run by volunteers from Council and Circle of Care who buy, cook, serve and clean up on a rotating basis. One mother from the building is actively involved, and teen volunteers from Temple Sinai and Holy Blossom Temple participated until recently as part of a project.

Once the program was under way, an open house was held for residents, volunteers and local politicians.

Fish, who has been an NCJW member for over 40 years, has always been impressed by how the organization serves the Jewish and general community, as it does in the multicultural building. Child poverty was pinpointed as one of two areas of priority for NCJW (along with women's issues) at its biennial convention in 1997, and the child poverty committee was formed shortly afterwards.

Fish helps set up at the breakfast club one morning a week. "A lot of people don't like to get up that early, [but] when you see these kids, and how they react, it's a wonderful feeling."

They do have to encourage the children to eat something nutritious, she noted. "They like the sugary stuff."

Marilyn Gross, past chair of Circle of Care's volunteer coordination and services committee, cooks and oversees the other volunteers one day a week.

The project is part of Circle of Care's intergenerational program. Group members had been researching breakfast clubs in hopes of starting one of their own when they heard of the NCJW project and asked to come on board.

In addition to serving breakfast, sometimes the volunteers help children with homework. "We have a few retired teachers," noted Gross, adding that the children are "delightful. They seem to be very appreciative, and they seem to have a grand time. It's a good beginning to the day."

Their contribution is modest when seen as part of already existing services, noted co-chair Ornoy.

Eventually, Fish said, NCJW hopes to expand the pilot project to other locations. "The number of women using food banks in Toronto has increased by 55 percent. We are attempting to alleviate this as much as we can."

Rabbi Lau set to visit

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Rabbi Yisroel Meir Lau, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel, will be the keynote speaker at Ohr Somayach's first Toronto dinner and dessert reception.

The dinner, Dec. 1 at the Sheraton Centre, will honor Stephen Rosen, current president of Ohr Somayach and a long-time volunteer for numerous Jewish causes in Toronto.

Jeremy Cohen, Ohr Somayach's director of financial resource development, described Rosen as "a superlative leader, who wants to see good things happen," and who does many charitable works with little or no fanfare.

Cohen told The CJN that, besides being a fundraiser, the event is designed to "bring together old and new friends of Ohr Somayach," and to give the organization more visibility in the community.

Rabbi Nota Schiller, rosh yeshiva of Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem, will speak at the dinner. There will be special presentations to Howard Sitzer, talmid of the year; to the family of the late Rabbi Uziel Milevsky, in honor of his contributions not only in Toronto but elsewhere; and to Rosen.

Dinner is called for 5:45 and the reception for 8 p.m. Tickets are $500 a plate for both the dinner and the reception or $90 for the dessert reception.

There are two campuses, one at 613 Clark Ave. W. in Thornhill and one at 446 Spadina Rd.

West Bank Jews face tough times, says Hebron leader

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If the town of Hebron is any indication, Jewish populations on the West Bank face tough times ahead, especially in the wake of the Wye agreement, says the leader of the municipality's Jewish government.

"We've been shot at. We've been firebombed. We're being attacked all the time," said Avraham Ben-Yosef, director of Jewish Hebron's municipal council.

Ben-Yosef, who is referred to by others, as well as himself, as the mayor of Hebron, told The CJN in a recent interview that the town's 550 Jews strive for normal lives amid a sea of hostile Palestinians.

He said Jews are the targets, almost every day, of rocks, bottles and firebombs hurled from the city's Palestinian side.

In January 1997, Israeli troops redeployed from 80 percent of Hebron as part of the Oslo accords, allowing for Palestinian control. The remaining 20 percent, comprised of about 54 Jewish families, including some 150 yeshiva students who live and study there, reside within a two- or three-square kilometre area, administered by Israel.

Jews are vastly outnumbered by about 20,000 Arabs. In what Ben-Yosef calls greater Hebron, which includes Kiryat Arba, Arabs outnumber Jews 10 to one.

Ben-Yosef said there are Israeli troops protecting Jews, as well as the Temporary International Presence in Hebron (TIPH), a multinational force, but that Palestinians get away with regular attacks.

Avraham Ben-Yosef

That's because Palestinian security forces ignore – even engage in – attacks on Jews, and Israeli troops are forbidden from engaging in so-called "hot pursuit" of suspected terrorists in Palestinian territory, he charged.

The Hebron agreement has failed to spell out what happens when either side violates the rules on the buffer separating Arabs and Jews, Ben-Yosef added.

He said a grenade attack in Hebron on Yom Kippur that killed a rabbi and injured 14 Israeli soldiers was just the latest salvo in an ongoing war with Arab terrorists, a war that will go on, if not escalate, following last month's signing of the land-for-peace Wye memorandum.

"Hebron is a microcosm of what's to be expected," said Ben-Yosef, a 40-year-old New York native. The Wye agreement, which will cede a further 13 percent of the West Bank to Palestinian control, will mean another 10 to 18 Jewish communities in the West Bank "will be surrounded by armed Arabs. If what has happened to us is an example, things will be very difficult."

He insisted he was not in Toronto to raise funds.

"We're here for awareness and moral support. People are asking questions. We want people to put Hebron on their agendas."

He said the Israeli army offered Jewish residents bulletproof windows. When settlers pointed out the windows could never be opened, the army offered clothes dryers and air conditioners.

"We said no. Our goal is to live normal lives."

He and other Jewish residents have "no interest in throwing out Arabs. We really don't have anything against them on a personal level," he said, noting that as leader of the Jewish municipal government, he has "correct" relations with Palestinians.

"Our problem is with the Jewish notion of a Palestinian nation."

Instead of land for peace, he said, settlers want peace for peace.

He said the council of Jewish communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza – known as Yesha – has rejected the Wye accord as a surrender and abandonment by Israel.

But Ben-Yosef remains steadfast in his determination to remain, despite pressure from the United States to cease Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

"Our apartments are full," he said. "We have no intention of going. We're staying."

Democracy's uneasy future

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many of today's democracies suffer from human rights abuses, victimization of ethnic minorities, marginalization of the poor, questionable election practices, and ineffectual parliaments, says Arthur Schlesinger, former adviser to President John F. Kennedy.

The family of democracies is growing, Schlesinger said in a recent lecture, "but many countries purporting to be democracies are shallow."

Schlesinger made the comments in a talk entitled Democracy on the Eve of the 21st Century: Under Attack or on the Ascendancy? His speech was part of the 1998 Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman three-part lecture series at Holy Blossom Temple.

The optimism at the end of the 20th century is not unlike the outlook at its beginning, he said. "But the optimism at the onset of the century faded quickly into World War I, the Depression and World War II."

By 1941, there were only about a dozen democracies left on the planet, he said.

"Democracies cannot just be created. They are not a mechanically transferable form of government."

Democracies emerge from a set of social and intellectual preconditions such as a rising middle class, equality before the law, reasonable degree of literacy, commitment to education and a wide distribution of economic opportunities, Schlesinger said.

He highlighted the threat of religious fundamentalism to democratic states.

"Islamic fundamentalism seems especially hostile to freedom of expression, women's rights, and unlike historical Islam, to other religions. Nor is a fundamentalist revival confined to the third world... Fundamentalism carried too far, has ominous implications for democracy. Those who believe they are executing the will of the almighty can be merciless to non-believers.

In the end, Schlesinger concluded democracy has a future, but it won't be an easy one.

After surviving the 20th Century by the "skin of its teeth, [democracy] will not enjoy a free ride" in the next century, he said.

"Democracy in the 21st century must manage the pressures of race, technology, capitalism, and it must cope with the spiritual frustrations and yearnings generated in the vast, terrifying anonymity of global society."

While wars of the past century arose from aggression across national frontiers, Schlesinger argued that 21st century wars will more likely be between ethnic, religious, ideological and tribal factions within the same country.

TORONTO — When war and security are the main issues in Israel, social welfare and women's issues take a back seat, noted the president of Na'amat Israel, here last month on a one-day stop in her North American tour.

"If we want to be a healthy society, we must bring peace to the area," said Hedva Almog in an interview at Na'amat Canada offices in the Borochov Centre.

Almog was accompanied by former MK Masha Lubelsky, president of the Na'amat world movement and former president of Na'amat Israel. Both women were here to meet with representatives of Na'amat Canada.

"I think we must build the relationship between Na'amat Canada and Na'amat Israel, not to come and say, 'give us,'" said Almog. "I think it's a mutual relationship."

She noted that Israeli women have benefited from Na'amat Canada-sponsored projects including day care centres and a women's shelter in Tel Aviv. (Locally, Na'amat Canada provides school supplies to children living in shelters.)

Canadian women, in turn, have expressed interest in attending more seminars in Israel, Almog said. She has agreed to take responsibility for that, and a Spring 1999 leadership program is in the works.

A retired brigadier general with a 25-year IDF career behind her, Almog, 47, would prefer her children, ages 11 and 15, see the army be able to take on a peacetime role so they can "use their knowledge and qualities in fields like high tech, industry and education. If we want to be a healthy society, we must bring peace to the area."

That doesn't mean Israel shouldn't have a strong army, clarified Lubelsky, 62, whose English was stronger than Almog's and who translated for her during part of the interview.

Both women expressed optimism about the prospects for peace in Israel, although Almog suggested that perhaps peace will be reached among individual citizens before their leaders come to agreement. Na'amat has been involved in grass roots meetings between Israeli Jewish women and their Palestinian counterparts, Almog said.

Issues such as abuse, sexual harassment, pay equity and religious freedom are prime concerns of Na'amat Israel. In some cases, the organization offers legal aid. Likewise in Toronto, Na'amat runs a weekly legal clinic.

Partly as a result of Na'amat Israel's efforts under Lubelsky's 11-year national presidency, Israeli women now have the right to retire between ages 60 and 65. Previously, women were forced to retire at 60 and men could continue working until age 65.

Na'amat Israel, with 800,000 members from a variety of political parties, is a social service agency and the women's arm of the Histadrut, the Jewish labor organization.

"We believe that women must take positions in all levels of politics," said Almog, who was nominated by Amram Mitzna, mayor of Haifa, to run as his deputy for the coming term of office.

She termed it "disappointing" that there are less than a dozen women members of Knesset, out of 120 MKs.

Whether or not Israel has another woman prime minister is not the main issue, said Lubelsky. "We can have one woman become prime minister and nothing among thousands of other [capable] women."

Saddam's retreat

As these words are being written, the U.S.-led, UN-authorized strike against Saddam Hussein has been called off, temporarily at least. Saddam's flurry of correspondence to the Security Council over the weekend appears to have contained sufficient capitulation to the demand to allow the unconditional return to Iraq of the UN weapons inspectors. As a result, Saddam has been granted yet another reprieve from military intervention against his capability to develop non-conventional weaponry of mass destruction.

Satisfied that Saddam has retreated from his most recent brink, and that he has agreed to complete compliance with the relevant UN resolutions on weapons inspections, the Americans and the British – the leaders of the UN allied coalition – are willing to keep their powder dry, for the moment. But they are not convinced that Saddam is being honest. Thus they will test and carefully study Saddam's fulfilment of his commitment to complete compliance.

Nor should they be convinced of his honesty, for he has never been honest in his dealings with the west in this matter, nor likely, in any matter.

His deceit toward the west notwithstanding, the vilest of his dishonesties are directed towards his own people.

He has impoverished them with his ambition. The Iraqi economy is in shambles because of his unwillingness to abandon his lust for power. He has deprived them with his megalomania. The incomes that do flow into the country earmarked by the UN for medical supplies and food have been diverted to the construction of his many private palaces and secret warehouses of hidden biological and chemical weaponry. And he has diminished the people with his despotism. They live without even minimal human rights, hear and read only Saddam-approved lies and are consigned to lives where truth, freedom and purpose are beyond reach, far away glimmers in far away lands.

The only long-lasting solution to the international instability caused by Saddam and to the domestic hardship he inflicts on his people is, as President Bill Clinton said at the White House last Sunday, his ouster. We hope that the will and the wherewithal exist among his people to remove Saddam from his palaces, permanently.

Reminder: It's false

Two weeks ago in this space, we wrote that the key election strategy of the Parti Québécois stands on a false premise. As noted commentator Lysiane Gagnon observes, to appeal to non-separatist, "soft" voters, Lucien Bouchard articulates a deliberately ambiguous policy on separatism. He repeatedly leaves the impression that he might somehow pursue a policy of "renewed federalism." Gagnon pointed out last weekend in her column in the Globe and Mail: "Bouchard often talks about a vote on 'sovereignty-partnership'... So this opens the possibility that the referendum would be about some kind of 'renewed federalism.'" The reason, of course, for the ambiguity by the premier is obvious. Again, according to Gagnon: "Polls always indicate that renewed federalism, whatever it means, is the favorite option of Quebecers."

But, let it be repeated, Bouchard is not interested in renewed federalism. He is interested in abandoned federalism. He never omits to be so explicit about federalism when addressing his party faithful, the hard core, dyed in the pure wool separatists.

With half the election campaign over and less than two weeks until the vote itself, it is important to remind readers of the falsehood that lies beneath Bouchard's carefully crafted ambiguity.

The only way federalism can be renewed for Quebecers, and thereby for the rest of Canada as well, is for a federalist leader to be elected premier of Quebec.

Differs with Zolf on Winnipeg's Peretz Shule

Recently, I received an article called "Socialism and the Shul," by Larry Zolf (CJN, Sept. 17). Sitting here in my far-flung outpost in Moshav Lachish, Israel, I read and reread Zolf's account with wide-eyed wonder. We went to the same Peretz Shule at approximately the same time, but are we talking about the same school? His whole account of the Peretz Shule of the '40s reads more like science fiction than biography.

First may I state, that I was privileged to be a pupil of Zolf's father, Falik Zolf, my first great teacher of Jewish literature, the man who at this early stage of my development, felt that I had writing talent, and from the beginning, encouraged me to write. Since it was the Peretz Shule, I first wrote in Yiddish, whereas today I write in English and Hebrew. However, the first push was from Chaver Zolf, as we called him (and when he wasn't listening, we fondly called him "Floz").

Larry Zolf's statement "Mapam was the only Jewish party who made room for Yiddish in the scheme of things" is pure fiction. With the founding of the Jewish state, with the ingathering of the exiles, a concentrated effort was made by all to revitalize the Hebrew language, in order to bind together the immigrants from all the continents, in order to unite these Jews with a common language. Yiddish could not have been that common language and it played no part in any political party.

This goal of revitalizing the Hebrew language has been achieved. Today we also have a chair of Yiddish studies in the Hebrew University. The interest in Yiddish has now been revived to some degree.

Most of our parents who sent us to study Yiddish in the Peretz Shule, were not Orthodox religious Jews, but Jews who observed Jewish traditions and Jewish holidays. In the Peretz Shule, we daily studied the Tanach in Hebrew with Yiddish translation. We celebrated all the Jewish holidays. Every Friday night, we gathered in the shule for the Oneg Shabbat and loudly sang "Shabbess, zol zain tomid Shabbes." I have a fond memory of dressing up as Esther Hamalka on Purim and making my way proudly through the streets of Winnipeg, to get to the Peretz Shule Purim party. The Shule was never blatantly socialist or atheistic. At no time in the years that Zolf was our teacher, did he ever pass out in our classes, "lampoons and satires of socialism." Nor were we ever subject to anti-religious propaganda of any kind.

As for the statement, "my father secretly introduced bar mitzvah training to the Peretz School," I was quite amused. In this little school with its tiny classes, could anyone secretly introduce a program of "bar mitzvah training" without the whole school knowing about it?

I can only decry the snide remarks about Rabbi Meyer Schwartzman, who according to Zolf was "the rabbi who made the salamis kosher." Rabbi Schwartzman was a highly honored rabbi in the Winnipeg Jewish community.

CJC did alert Jakobek about McNulty

I read with interest your article (CJN, Oct. 22) entitled "Toronto drops plans for McNulty park."

For the record, I believe it is important to clarify at least one important matter. Your article, while not quoting me directly, left the inference that Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, may have in some way acted improperly by not informing me in advance of a media story in the Globe & Mail of the McNulty situation. In fact, I received an information package from CJC in early September, well prior to the article appearing in the newspaper.

I am grateful to CJC for providing the research materials that were necessary for me to make the proper decision in ensuring that a park was not named after an individual of McNulty's ilk.

Arafat must recognize Israel's right to exist

The stipulation that Yasser Arafat rewrite the odious parts of the Palestinian Charter which called for Israel's destruction is imperative. In addition, he should be called upon to repudiate all people who preach hatred for Jews. If he fails to do so, then his commitment at Wye Mills, Md., will have as much force and effect as the Iranian government saying it no longer calls for the death of Salman Rushdie, and yet takes no steps to prosecute organized groups within Iran that threaten to do exactly the same thing. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is absolutely correct in refusing to relinquish one further inch of the West Bank until the Palestinian Charter is amended in clear and unequivocal language recognizing the State of Israel's right to exist.

Assessing Netanyahu's performance

By YOEL MARCUS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Author says, "Wye Accord deserves high marks"

Now that he has pushed the Wye agreement on the implementation of the second West Bank withdrawal through the government, Bibi can be compared to a problem student who performs poorly throughout the entire school year but who suddenly comes up with a mark of 100 on the algebra final.

How do we assess such a student? On the basis of overall performance during the year, or on the basis of the surprising grade on the final exam? And how should we interpret that surprising grade? Will this student continue to be a problematic non-achiever or does the exam herald the birth of a new, A-average super-scholar?

The answer to these questions, whether we are talking about a student or a prime minister, cannot be unequivocal, because we are also dealing with a personality problem. In both cases, the determining factor is not the overall performance, but rather, the end result.

The plain, bald fact is that Bibi got his cabinet to ratify Wye. True, the ratification was not carried out against the background of a dazzling fireworks display; however, the important point is that the cabinet approved it, and that it will be ratified by the Knesset with a crushing majority. No cabinet minister resigned from the government, and the sky did not fall upon Bibi's head. This does not, however, mean that from now on we will see a new Bibi or that he has been transformed into a great leader for our country.

It was said about the late minister of education and culture Zalman Aranne, that, for one day each month, he would go stark-raving mad; the only problem was that no one knew which day.

By the same token, one could say that Bibi has his moments of clear-sighted, brilliant decision-making; the only problem is that no one knows when, how and why those moments occur. For example, Bibi had a moment of decision-making clarity a year and a half ago in Hebron, and recently in the cabinet's ratification of the Wye agreement.

It is immaterial what conditions the government imposed when it approved the accord nor what the various ministers said in the cabinet debate over Wye. What is important, is that the government of Israel has agreed to hand over 27 percent of the "Jewish homeland" to the Palestinians.

Last week in Tel Aviv, right wing Israelis demonstrated their opposition to the Wye Accord. [Reuters/RNS photo]

In the course of his first two years as prime minister, Bibi has put in a poor leadership performance because of his personality problems, and because of his unpredictable behavior patterns, which stem from an obsessive fear of being turned out of office and from a basic lack of integrity.

His behavior has made him the least credible prime minister this country has ever had. However, the most serious problem is that, in the first half of his prime ministership, Bibi has displayed a chronic state of cold feet and has shown himself to be a leader without a compass.

This past week, one of the most centrally placed members of the cabinet said about Bibi: "I still cannot fathom what on earth he wants."

If Bibi was against the Wye agreement, why did he go to America in the first place? However, since he did go and did sign on the dotted line, why did he not launch a lightning offensive to obtain cabinet approval immediately upon his return to Israel? Why the delay? After all, the very same parties that are opposed to the withdrawal are also not interested in early elections. Why did he take so long before getting his act together? In doing so, he just gave his opponents more time to get their act together. Why did he have to wait until U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had to issue an ultimatum, and why did her boss, President Bill Clinton, in the context of a conversation about Iraq, have to prod Bibi to get the agreement ratified by the end of this week? And, after submitting the agreement to the cabinet for approval, why did Bibi hamstring himself by declaring that the "government would scrutinize each stage in the agreement?"

There are those who compare Bibi to Golda Meir. Actually, he more closely resembles Levi Eshkol, who was famous for fence-sitting and who, whenever possible, put off for the day after tomorrow what he could do today.

However, Bibi's chronic indecisiveness has carried a heavy price tag. Anyone who has had any dealings with him has quickly learned that the only language he really understands is force, and that he only acts if there is absolutely no other option. A year after Bibi promised Clinton a double-digit withdrawal, after he managed to antagonize the world's leaders and after he gained the reputation of being a liar, he has no other option now but to do what he could have done a year ago.

What has Bibi gained by this kind of behavior? He has chosen to forsake and to destroy the peace process' essential spirit of conciliation. Bibi the trickster, the schemer and the indecisive leader ultimately found himself at a point where he had to shift from virtual reality to the real thing. He kept on postponing until he had driven everyone up the wall, but, in the end, he came through with the goods. In all likelihood, he will drag the implementation of the withdrawal well beyond its three-month timetable. However, what is important is that, in the end, he will carry out the withdrawal. Period.

This week, Bibi made history because, thanks to him, the Palestinians will have 42 percent of the West Bank by spring. Labor chief Ehud Barak would not have given more. Bibi will no doubt be referred to in the school textbooks of the future Palestinian state not only as the leader who carried out the Oslo agreements he had "inherited" from Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres but also as the Israeli prime minister who weakened the right, and destroyed the Likud's ideology more effectively than anyone on the left could ever have done.

Who knows, perhaps Bibi might also become the first prime minister to dismantle the settlements, because, in Bibi's case, it is not the intention but rather the outcome that counts.

What's new? Much too much

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Few countries rival Israel when it comes to generating the kind of news that captures headlines around the globe. It's a distinction most Israelis could gladly do without. But what the outside world sees in the media is only the tip of the iceberg, a mere slice of the daily diet of harrowing events, raucous debate and poignant sagas that are so much a part of Israeli society.

To open a newspaper here, or to tune in to the countless newscasts and public affairs programs on the radio and TV, is to be overwhelmed by the drama of life in the Promised Land – much of it played out in near fever pitch in the media. Given such non-stop intensity, it's a wonder the whole nation is not on tranquilizers.

If in many countries, the news is just another form of entertainment, in Israel it's anything but. What happens here matters deeply to people, affecting them directly. Too much is at stake.

In any given week, more hard news occurs in Israel than during half a year in Switzerland, or perhaps even Canada. Take one seven-day period earlier this month as an example.

It began with nation-wide ceremonies to mark the third anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, and ended with the peace process derailed by the latest Palestinian bombing attack, this time in Jerusalem. In between, a cavalcade of events unfolded in rapid-fire succession, of which the following is only a selection:

• A Tel Aviv rally in memory of Rabin attracted 150,000 people.
• The next day, at a televised state ceremony at Jerusalem's Mt. Herzl Cemetery, as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu laid a wreath at Rabin's grave, hecklers screamed that he had incited to Rabin's murder.
• President Ezer Weizman warned that, based on recent indications, more political assassinations could happen.
• Israeli security officials voiced concern over a new Iraqi-UN crisis, adding that nearly one-third of the public is without proper gas masks.
• U.S.-Israeli relations worsened as Jerusalem delayed ratification of the Wye agreement with the Palestinians.
• The immigrant soldier killed in the jeep that protected children in a school bus from terrorist bombing was buried.
• Left- and right-wing activists, police and Palestinians clashed at the site of the controversial Jewish housing project at Ras al Amud in east Jerusalem.
• The shekel dropped to a new low against the dollar.
• There was an outcry over police brutality against university students during protests for lower tuition.
• An Israeli cabinet minister hosted a meeting during which three major churches in Jerusalem agreed – after five years of deliberations – to build a new exit at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, one of Christianity's most sacred sites.
• The Israeli Air Force launched attacks on Hezbollah bases in Lebanon.
• Municipal election campaigns were marred by unprecedented levels of violence against candidates and campaign workers.
• The Supreme Court made a historic ruling against the Orthodox monopoly of local religious services by ordering religious councils in major cities to accept Reform and Conservative Jews as members.
• Israel sent emergency aid to hurricane victims in Central America.
• A memorial ceremony was held on the fourth anniversary of a terrorist attack on the bus in Tel Aviv that killed 22 people.
• A Haifa judge was assaulted in court.
• The attorney general announced the decision to indict a former general security service agent for his failure to prevent the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.
• Netanyahu was lambasted for his statement implying that the votes of Arab citizens count for less than those of Jews.
• After talks with the Treasury failed, university students vowed to step up their protest campaign with a hunger strike.
• The government denied a CTV report that Mossad agents still use Canadian passports.
• Maccabi Haifa made soccer history with the defeat of the Austrian team to reach the Euro quarterfinal.
• Israeli researchers were involved in a major medical breakthrough in repairing damaged tissue.
• Two Israelis were arrested for spying in Cyprus.

Chock it all up to just another week in the life of Israel, part of the daily roller coaster ride of emotional highs and lows, according to the triumphs, tribulations and tragedies of the nation. There is virtually no let-up. If Shabbat didn't exist, it would have to be invented, if for nothing else, to stem the news flow once a week.

Wye: Guide for the perplexed

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The only aspect of the Wye Accord that is clear, is that the agreement itself is entirely unclear. The written memorandum, which was designed to end 18 months of deadlock, is ambiguous on the key issues, and is supplemented by a number of "oral agreements", which are subject to different interpretations.

The arguments over interpretation started immediately after the signing.

Many of the issues remain under dispute, including the oft-repeated pledge to repeal sections of the Palestinian Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel. Other key requirements, such as the arrest of suspected terrorists, and the criteria for judging the degree of Palestinian compliance with the prohibition on incitement and the efforts to prevent terrorism, were also left hanging.

While there is agreement on the amount of territory to be turned over to the Palestinians – the famous 13.1 percent – there was no agreement within Israel regarding the details and maps.

These problems are yet another reflection of the basic difficulties inherent in the overall concept. From the beginning of this process, the asymmetry between Israel and Palestinians posed a major challenge.

While Israel had something very tangible in the form of land to offer in return for peace (meaning, first and foremost, security), the Palestinians only offered intangibles, such as promises, pledges, and words. They can pledge to fight terror, arrest and try suspects, talk about the legitimacy of Israel and the need to live in peace with the Jewish state, etc. But the fear of Israelis is that once the Palestinians receive a substantial portion of territory, these pledges could easily be reversed, leaving Israel in a far more dangerous position.

To address these fears, the Palestinians need to convince Israelis, through actions as well as words, that the foundation for terrorism and hatred, such as the rejection of the legitimacy of Israel, is being dismantled.

The demand for a public debate and binding vote to remove the sections of the Palestinian Charter that call for the destruction of Israel is designed to convey the message that the goal of the destruction of the State of Israel has been dropped. But at Wye, Arafat balked at an explicit agreement to repeal these sections in a meeting of the Palestinian National Council, arguing that to do so under pressure would be humiliating.

In response, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, under American pressure, agreed to more ambiguous language. Verbally, the Palestinians accepted the Israeli requirements, but then, when everyone had left Washington, the back-pedaling resumed.

Instead of the public "reaffirmation" in the presence of President Bill Clinton, that had been expected, the process was transformed into a public meeting to be addressed by the U.S. leader, which Palestinian officials would merely attend.

The sections of the Palestinian National Charter that call for Israel's destruction would remain, as would the public impression that these goals were still accepted by the Palestinian leadership. In other words, instead of increasing confidence, the ambiguity of the Wye Agreement led to increased tension.

The issue of detention and trial of terrorist suspects was also bungled in the Wye memorandum. At the meeting, Israel handed the Americans and Palestinians a list of 30 key suspects who were involved in attacks against Israelis, and who are known to be in the areas controlled by the PA (including 12 employed by the Palestinian police). However, instead of demanding that they be detained immediately, Netanyahu left with an unwritten agreement that the terrorists would be arrested in stages, over a 12-week period.

Later, when the Cabinet and Knesset demanded guarantees of implementation, the U.S. government sent Israel a letter, insuring Arafat's compliance (without specifying how this would be accomplished).

When one of the terrorist cells dispatched suicide bombers to Jerusalem, many Israelis wanted to know why Netanyahu did not demand the immediate detention of the infamous 30 before he agreed to meet with Clinton and Arafat. The government's answers were not convincing.

Despite the fanfare, the Wye summit and memorandum were not successful in removing the central obstacles to the Palestinian-Israeli negotiation process. The asymmetries remain, but the era in which Israelis were willing to accept vague pledges and oral agreements from the Palestinians has ended.

In return for turning over tangible assets, in the form of territory, to the Palestinians, Israelis now demand tangible proof that the Palestinians are also fulfilling their end of the bargain. Without this essential structural change, exercises similar to the Wye summit are not going to break the deadlock.

The sanctification of Edith Stein

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

On Oct. 11, Pope John Paul II raised Edith Stein, who had been born a Jew, to the rank of saint. A lively discussion ensued, and it is time to lay it to rest.

Edith Stein was the 11th child of an Orthodox Jewish family in Breslau (today Wroclaw in Poland). When she grew up, she first became an atheist, then a student of philosopher Edmund Husserl. In 1922, at age 31, she converted to Catholicism, assuming the name of Sister Teresia Benedicta of the Carmelite order.

In Cologne in 1938, she was discovered to be a non-Aryan, and after Kristallnacht, she fled with her sister to Holland.

Already in 1932, Edith Stein had written to Pope Pius XI and asked him in the strongest terms to oppose the spreading plague of anti-Semitism. When the Germans occupied the Netherlands, the Dutch churches protested; Hitler's governor general suggested that if they would stop their critique, he would leave their non-Aryan members alone. The Protestants complied, but the Catholic churches did not and continued to condemn the Jewish persecution. A protest was read in all their churches in July 1942.

Shortly thereafter, Gestapo agents broke into the nunnery, arrested Edith and her sister, and gassed them in Auschwitz a week later.

The argument about Stein's sainthood can be simply stated: The Church, it was said, acquired her for herself as a Christian martyr, when in fact she was murdered by the Germans because she was born a Jew. She could therefore not be considered to have been martyred for her faith.

Jews have not been the only ones to criticize the sanctification; chief amongst the critics has been the Roman Catholic theologian, Hans Kueng. His point was that the Church had failed Edith Stein because it had undertaken no concerted action when she was arrested, and that her sanctification therefore lacked a moral basis.

I have followed the discussion with considerable interest and have come to the conclusion that both sides are right. Of course, Edith Stein was killed because she was considered a Jew. On the other hand, it was clear that she would have been left alone, as were Dutch non-Aryan Protestants, had the Catholic churches in Holland given in to the edict of the Nazi governor general. Therefore, killing Edith Stein was also meant as a blow to the Catholic Church. This was one of those moments in history when both Catholicism and Judaism were together attacked by the Nazi monster. Edith Stein was the convenient victim with which to hurt the Church. Killed as a Jew, but also as a Catholic, she satisfied the purposes of Nazi revenge.

She has become the first saint of Jewish origin since the early days of the Church, when many if not most Christians were born Jews. History takes its own course and does so in strange ways. Whenever the irrationality of Nazis comes into view, rational and unemotional considerations run into difficulties. I wonder what Nazis who still survive to this day think of it all. As for me, the matter is closed and belongs to those episodes of our past that are best left to memory.

The Kirshner File

Lavon affair rocked Israel

The gravest political scandal ever to rock Israel – the Lavon affair – turned on a bungled Israeli sabotage operation in Egypt in 1954. It shook Israel to its foundations, causing the resignation of a defence minister and then a prime minister.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Infinitely more serious than last year's Bar-On affair, which almost toppled Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud government, the scandal boiled down to one burning question: Who authorized the amateurish operation?

An accusing finger was pointed at two men: Pinhas Lavon, who had been appointed defence minister in January 1954, and Benjamin Givly, the director of military intelligence since March of that year. Their respective struggle to rehabilitate themselves consumed Israel and devoured reputations. The repercussions are still felt.

Shabtai Teveth, a respected Israeli journalist and biographer, wades into the controversy with a meticulously-researched book entitled Ben-Gurion's Spy (Columbia University Press).

It's a well told, though convoluted, story of foreign intrigue and domestic conceit. No one who reads it can ever again argue that Israel is a society governed solely by idealism.

The scandal is rooted in Egyptian soil. In July 1952, a cabal of army officers in Egypt staged a coup, overthrowing the corrupt monarchy. Less than two years later, one of its leading lights, Gamal Abdel Nasser, who had fought with honor in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, seized control of the junta.

The development alarmed Lavon, a person whom Teveth describes as a riddle. Intimidatingly intelligent, Lavon had once been a pacifist and an internationalist. With his appointment as defence minister, he transformed himself into a hardline nationalist and an advocate of force.

Lavon had a jaundiced view of Nasser, believing that his efforts to improve bilateral relations with Britain were directly linked to his desire to facilitate the pullout of British troops from the Suez Canal area.

Lavon feared that such a withdrawal would have dreadful consequences. It would remove a valuable buffer between Israel and Egypt and thereby undermine Israel's security. With Givly's encouragement, Lavon formulated a plan – a reckless one, in Teveth's estimation – to head off Britain's departure from Egypt.

Disregarding all norms of transparency, the pair never bothered to inform the prime minister, Moshe Sharett, the cabinet or the military high command of their machiavellian scheme, which was predicated on a bombing campaign of Egyptian public buildings and British and American institutions in Egypt. Lavon and Givly hoped that the bombings would have the effect of undermining Western confidence in the Egyptian government and thereby forestall a British withdrawal from the Suez Canal.

With this in mind, they assembled a team of saboteurs, consisting mainly of Jews living in Egypt and led by Avry Elad (Avraham Seidenberg), a Viennese Jew who had reached Palestine as a boy in the late 1930s.

Lavon and Givly evidently assumed that the bombings in Cairo and Alexandria would be blamed on opposition forces like the Muslim Brotherhood or the Communists rather than on Israel.

It was not to be, and in a word, the operation was a disaster. Betrayed by Elad, who was subsequently revealed as a double agent, Israel's hapless agents on the ground were captured and put on trial. Furthermore, Britain went ahead with its withdrawal, the last of its soldiers leaving Egypt in June 1955.

The botched operation unleashed a firestorm in Israel. Who had authorized it? Who had ordered its implementation? The ensuing scandal engulfed Israel in chaos.

Givly claimed that Lavon had given the order. Lavon flatly denied the allegation. A ministerial committee was established to ascertain the truth. But Sharett, feeling betrayed by his defence minister, hewed to the belief that Lavon was the culprit.

In his diary, he wrote: "Let us assume that Givly acted on his own authority...even then, does moral responsibility not devolve upon Lavon, who incessantly advocated acts of madness, and inculcated the military leadership with the diabolical notion of igniting the Middle East (and) fomenting disputes...?"

By Teveth's reckoning, Sharett, who had succeeded David Ben-Gurion as premier in January 1954, never trusted Lavon and, in fact, sought his dismissal. Try as he might, Sharett could not get rid of Lavon. Ben-Gurion, Israel's eminence grise, believed that Lavon's removal would cause a major crisis in the ruling Mapai party.

In February 1955, however, Lavon stepped down, saying he had been subjected to a campaign of vilification. The matter did not end there. Lavon claimed that the Egyptian operation had been launched without his authorization or knowledge, and suggested that Givly was at fault.

Amid the acrimony, Ben-Gurion, who had resigned as prime minister in December 1953, returned to government service, succeeding Lavon as defence minister under the premiership of Sharett. In November of the same year, Ben-Gurion returned to his post as prime minister.

The plot thickened in 1956. Lavon, with Ben-Gurion's blessing, was elected secretary-general of the Histadrut labor federation, a position he used to promote his rehabilitation. Givly, meanwhile, left military intelligence, taking over the command of the Golani infantry brigade.

There were further developments. In 1958, the chief of staff, Gen. Haim Laskov, appointed a commission to examine "the circumstances and causes of the collapse of the (spy) network in Egypt."

The commission, though it failed to complete its task, convinced the government to charge Elad with perfidy. In August 1960, he was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. The sentence was later reduced.

Even so, the scandal continued to simmer. Convinced that Givly had resorted to lies and forgery to defame him, Lavon took his case straight to Ben-Gurion. Lavon wanted nothing less than an immediate exoneration.

Vacillating, Ben-Gurion refused to take sides. He said that since he had never condemned Lavon, he could not now exonerate him.

Eventually, Lavon got his way. Ben-Gurion appointed a ministerial committee to investigate the affair. It exonerated Lavon. Ben-Gurion refused to accept the verdict and upped the ante by demanding that Mapai choose between himself and Lavon. Ben-Gurion won this battle of wills: Mapai's central committee voted to dismiss Lavon from his job at the Histadrut.

The storm clouds emanating from the Lavon affair continued to darken Israel's political landscape, and its ripple effects prompted Ben-Gurion to resign yet again in 1963.

Teveth, best known for his multivolume biography of Ben-Gurion, believes that Lavon and Givly were equally responsible for authorizing the operation in Egypt. As he puts it: "...there was a firm understanding between Givly and Lavon... that...operations in Egypt were possible and desirable..."

Teveth, moreover, argues that the Lavon affair highlighted the ethical and moral shortcomings of Israeli politicians, as well as military leaders, and thereby coarsened political discourse in Israel. Four decades after it aroused a nation, the scandal still haunts Israel.

Striking a balance in life

In the complicated process of unravelling what it meant to me to be a young Jew, the Holocaust and its lessons became the centre of my Jewish identity. "Never forget" were words that I lived my Jewish life by, and how could I forget? The Diary Anne of Frank and When Hitler Stole Pink Rabbit were some of my first books.

The walls of my house, which were lined with old photographs of family members who died in Nazi concentration camps, served as a constant reminder that I was the grandchild of survivors. The Holocaust was even embodied in my secular life. The Academy Awards praised Schindler's List, and governments built museums and erected monuments in remembrance. The Holocaust became an obsession which encompassed everything Judaic.

This summer, I participated in United Synagogue Youth Israel Pilgrimage/Poland seminar, hoping that my nine days in Poland would finally provide me with some measure of understanding of the Holocaust that I had longed for all my life.

As I stood outside Auschwitz, I realized that there could be no understanding, no explanation. I had already been to Sobibor and to Majdanek but without insight. I had only been bombarded with more images of the great indignity committed by man upon man, but this time, I could reach out and touch those images. My experience to that point had contributed to my confusion, heightening my search for answers to why and how. I was frustrated.

Life as usual seemed to be going on all around me. The other teenagers from my group were snacking on candy bars, flowers were growing in the fields, grass grew out of the ashes at Sobibor, but I couldn't breathe. I was suffocated by thousands of questions. When I discovered that I would never be able to answer those questions, I felt the burden of reading to understand things. And with that, I saw Judaism drained from me. Without my search for understanding which had dominated my Jewish life, what was left? Tradition, prayer and ritual meant nothing but aspects of Judaism to be preserved out of respect for the victims. My Jewish life was empty without the Holocaust and I was skeptical that I would ever find anything to fill that void.

The emptiness I felt in Poland, however, was quickly alleviated by my five weeks in Israel.

As my bus drove up the steep hill from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, my soul was elevated and renewed. Almost immediately, I was enveloped by the country's warmth and beauty, and felt a sense of community which I had never experienced before (feeling the sun reflect off the Jerusalem stone, hiking in the Galil, climbing Masada, spending a Shabbat on a moshav, touching the Kotel).

Every moment I spent in Israel uncovered the essence of Judaism which I had failed to see. Judaism meant perseverance rather than death; self-improvement and introspection rather than destruction; faith in the human spirit and the good of man rather than evil.

I no longer see my religious freedom to be preserved only to prevent the Holocaust from happening again, but rather as an integral element for the continuation of the Jewish community. I no longer see Israel only as a necessity as our physical sanctuary, but also as the centre of Jewish spirituality. I have reached a balance between remembrance and survival.

I still live my life by the words "never forget" but they have taken on a new role. I will never forget the horrors of the Holocaust, but I can not neglect the deeper meaning of Judaism which has survived despite the attempts to destroy it and in which I have found so much beauty and opportunity for personal growth.

Examining Wye on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Ever since the Wye River memorandum was signed last month, the World Wide Web has gone into hyper-drive keeping up with the developments in the peace process. The Internet excels in this area because it can deliver news and detailed analysis in a quantity (and sometimes quality) unavailable in most newspapers and magazines.

Also, the Internet allows you to examine, first hand, official documents that are mentioned in the media but rarely duplicated in their entirety. For example, Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs provides an excellent resource of over 30 peace process reference documents [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00pq0]. You'll find the full text of every document from the Balfour Declaration (1917) to U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 (1967) to the Camp David accords (1978) to the Wye River memorandum (1998).

The negotiations at Wye continued far longer than expected and nearly collapsed more than once. The Jerusalem Post's Danna Harman provides an interesting behind-the-scenes look at those gruelling nine days in Reflections on Wye [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Wye/reporter.html]: "Munching on chocolate chip cookies and intermittently nodding off to sleep, the exhausted negotiators stressed that this was the absolute best deal we could have gotten."

And for a bit of eye candy, take a look at a Photo Album of that week's negotiations from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Web site [http://www.pmo.gov.il/english/policy/wye-3.html].

The day of the signing ceremony did not go off without a hitch. The reason for the delay on that final day was negotiation over the fate of Jonathan Pollard, a civilian United States Navy intelligence analyst. Pollard has been serving a life sentence since 1987, when he entered into a plea bargain and admitted that he had passed sensitive U.S. information to the Israeli government.

Netanyahu had hoped to gain a presidential pardon for Pollard, but in the end, Clinton agreed only to review his case. For several sites sympathetic to Pollard, see Mining Co.'s IsraeliCulture page [http://israeliculture.miningco.com/library/weekly/aa102498.htm], including a passionate defence by Alan Dershowitz [http://www.interlog.com/~abrooke/jp/1994/060094.htm]. "No person in history has ever served as much time for spying for an ally…He should be free now."

The weekend after the Wye agreement, Joseph DiGenova, the former federal prosecutor who took on Pollard in the 1980s appeared on This Week with Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts. He argued that Jonathan Pollard remains a threat to American security and deserves to stay behind bars [http://abcnews.com/onair/thisweek/transcripts/thisweek_981025pollard_trans.html].

"It would be outrageous to release Mr. Pollard. He has nothing to do with the Middle East peace process…Nothing matches what he did in terms of the compromise of the technical intelligence capability of this country and he put at risk human lives."

Finally, late that Friday afternoon at Wye, the Pollard issue was resolved and the agreement was signed.

The U.S. State Department's Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs provides a detailed site with all the press briefings conducted throughout the summit [http://www.state.gov/www/regions/nea/wye_summit.html]. It includes a link to the signing ceremony when Yasser Arafat declared he would do everything he can "so that no Israeli mother would be worried if her son or daughter was late coming home, or any Israeli would be afraid when they heard an explosion." [http://www.state.gov/www/regions/nea/981023_signing.html].

As with every Mideast treaty, the signing of the agreement is merely the first step. The real test is the implementation. Next week, a closer look at the Wye River memorandum from Israeli and Arab perspectives.

A look at Rav Kirshner

Kaaterskill Falls*, by Allegra Goodman (The Dial Press, $32.95).

The setting of this low-key foray into the world of Orthodox Jews is a small town in the Catskills, the summer outpost of the devout followers of Rav Kirshner. During the winter months, members of the close-knit clan live in New York City's Washington Heights neighborhood.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The novel covers two years (1976 to 1978) and at its centre, exercising control over his followers, is the elderly, sick Rav, urgently preoccupied with the question of his successor.

The Rav "is a rationalist, interested in law, not myth. People do not flock to him with supplications, or for blessings on their enterprises. He is not the sort of Rav to whom men pour out their hearts, pleading for words of wisdom and glimpses of hope. He makes rulings on legal questions, dictates the standards of the community, but he is no counselor or magician to his people. It is not for him to pull happiness out of a hat, exorcise evil, or divine misfortune in the misshapen letter of a mezuzah."

Which of his two sons will follow him as leader? Isaiah, his father's secretary, is devoted, pious, and sensible – but stolid and unimaginative. His brother Jeremy, is brilliant, a professor of Italian literature at Queen's College. Although blessed with a profound knowledge of Halachah and its sources, clearly his brother's intellectual superior, he is at the same time worldly, egotistical and not interested in assuming his father's exalted position.

After his father's death Isaiah becomes leader, but Jeremy, unexpectedly, is willed his father's vast library. "The books smell of mildew. Jeremy can barely look at them, he feels for the books a kind of pity and disgust. They are stained and battered, and where they are edged with gold, the gilt is slick and soft with dust. Their companion volumes, his father's dark-covered sacred texts, are at the yeshiva, open on tables, studied and taught, discussed and still alive. These, here, alone separated from that library, lie readable but dead in their stacks."

What the Rav's decision means, how it is received by the brothers and eventually resolved, is one of the book's larger surprises.

Among the Rav's followers is Elizabeth Shulman, model wife and mother, but also well educated and modern in outlook who "spent her pregnancies with Jane Austin and Leo Tolstoy." She gives her five daughters traditional Hebrew names, but also elegant English ones. "They're very good children. They expect to marry scholars and then support them while they learn. But Elizabeth imagines someday her daughters could be scholars themselves – not of Talmud, of course, but perhaps Tanach. Or at other times she thinks one of them could become a writer, or an artist. Naturally, becoming a mother, keeping a Jewish home, is the most important thing. But somehow she can't see it as the only thing for her girls."

She is quietly and uncomplainingly divided in her allegiance – between the strong clinging demands of the group, and the call of a more exciting and rewarding outside world. To the consternation of some and the surprise of all she decides to open a store. "She feels the desire as intense as prayer." She manages to get the Rav's approval. Unhappily, she caters a birthday party with food that was not sanctioned in the licence provided by the Rav. His son, now the intractable leader, revokes the licence.

This is not a novel of dramatic action; there is little narrative pace or movement. But the author, at 31, with two books of well-received short stories to her credit, Total Immersion (1993) and The Family Markowitz (1996) is a literary phenomenon, a superior storyteller who writes with a keen eye for detail and undeniable empathy for her diverse characters.

All of her material has focused on Jewish concerns in a positive and knowledgeable manner. Kaaterskill Falls, no exception, is a pleasurable and enlivening read.

The spirit of the law

Business & Halachah

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

While Jewish law, especially as it relates to commercial practice, is essentially a legal system, its goal is not just compliance, but rather to make us into a holy nation. Holiness, however, is not necessarily expressed through the practice of Jewish law.

Nachmanides (13th century Spain) points out that one can be a scoundrel even if following the letter of each and every law. Technically speaking no Jewish law is violated when one eats like a glutton, sleeps away his day and cohabits constantly with his wife. Holiness, though, requires that we observe not only the letter, but also the spirit of the law. Therefore it is not surprising that Judaism expects its adherents to act beyond the letter of the law and waive some of our legal rights in dealing with our fellow man.

Nachmanides, in his biblical commentary, explains that it is impossible for any law to legislate every possible case. The Torah therefore commands that we must "do what is upright and good in God's eye" (Deuteronomy 6:18), which is a general imperative to "compromise and act beyond the letter of the law." So important is this concept of lifnim meshurat hadin that the Talmud claims that Jerusalem was destroyed because the concept was neglected.

A litigious society where everybody demands their full legal rights is one that cannot endure. Waiving some of our rights is an expression of our concern for our fellow man and hence serves as an antidote to sinaat chinam (needless hatred), which is the classic reason given for the destruction of our Temple.

In citing a classic example of lifnim meshurat hadin, the Talmud records the case of poor workers who after a hard day's work broke a valuable barrel of wine belonging to their boss. While strict justice would make the workers liable for their tort, Rava recommended that no claims for damages be brought against the employees. Furthermore he suggested that the poor workers actually be paid for their efforts even though the net effect of their activities caused a monetary loss to their employer.

Another example recorded in the Talmud requires a prospective seller of property to offer the right of first refusal to the abutter of the property. Since no loss accrues to the seller, why not make the neighbor happy. In fact the abutter who is not offered the property may, if he acts immediately upon hearing of the sale, pay the actual sale price to the vendor and claim possession of the property.

Rabbinic authorities have applied the principle of lifnim meshurat hadin to a wide variety of cases, ranging from ordering the return of a lost object, even when the owner had previously given up hope of recovering the item; to requiring severance pay, even though none was stipulated in the contract; to having a tenant, upon being offered suitable alternate arrangements, vacate the premises in order that the landlord can make repairs to the apartment. In the above cases it was to be expected that one voluntarily waives one's right in order to promote societal wellbeing.

Perhaps no greater example of acting beyond the call of duty can be found than that of Rav Safra. The Talmud relates that a heathen approached him with a monetary offer for his property. As Rav Safra was in the midst of reciting the Shema he did not respond. The heathen, believing his offer was too low, kept raising his price as Rav Safra continued in his prayers. Upon completion Rav Safra requested only the original low offer, saying that upon hearing that first offer he had in mind to accept it.

The Talmud records that God prays every day. In His prayers God prays that He will judge the Jewish people lifnim meshurat hadin, beyond the call of strict justice. Imitatio Dei requires that we do no less.

Ronen wants Swiss funds distributed evenly

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Of the estimated 16,000 Holocaust survivors in Canada, those who say they are in need will each get an equal amount, likely about $250, from the Swiss humanitarian fund.

This is the formula, subject to the approval of a special committee headed by Rabbi Gunther Plaut, suggested by Moshe Ronen, Canadian Jewish Congress president.

When the $2.5 million (US) allotted to Canada is divided among needy survivors, the net amount will not be large, Ronen said in a recent talk at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

"We have written to the director general of the World Jewish Restitution Organization in Jerusalem asking for an explanation of how this figure for Canada was determined and if this amount can be increased," he said.

He added that he will also plead Canada's case when he is in Israel, this week.

16,000 survivors in Canada

Of 600,000 Jewish Holocaust survivors in the world, 350,000 live in Israel and 16,000 live in Canada. The total Swiss humanitarian fund is $185 million (US).

Though the CJC has not yet received any money, Ronen expects it will have the funds in a few months and by then application forms will be ready and a hotline set up.

"We hope it will be no more than a total of six months before we have the money all distributed," he told The CJN.

He expects that Rabbi Plaut's committee, which will be made up mostly of survivors, will decide against any detailed inquiry into every applicant's need. Many survivors may choose not to apply, he said.

November's a month to remember

(The following remarks were delivered on Nov. 4 at an event held by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority.)

The event tonight, which falls in the middle of Holocaust Education Week, reminds me of the fact that the month of November carries enormous importance for us. On November 2, 1917, Lord Balfour, the British prime minister and statesman, declared in a letter to Lord Rothschild that Britain favored the establishment of a national home for Jews in Palestine.

Diplomatically Speaking
Jehudi Kinar

On Nov. 2, 1898, exactly 100 years ago, Theodor Herzl was received by the German emperor in Jerusalem, and Herzl wrote in his diary: "That brief reception will live on forever in Jewish history, and possibly may entail world consequences."

Forty years later, Kristallnacht took place, and all of us here know how that night became the trigger to the Holocaust.

Ten years later, on November 29th, the UN accepted the partition plan for Palestine. The motion was carried by 33 to 13. If history had taken a different course and the State of Israel had been established in 1917 or 1938, the calamity would not have befallen the Jewish people. But one can't change the course of history, and for that reason we remember this year, the 60 years which have passed since Kristallnacht, and on the happy side, the 50 years since the establishment of the State of Israel.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, in cooperation with the Women's Division of State of Israel Bonds, have decided to pay tribute tonight to six women Holocaust survivors who have contributed, each in her way, to the community.

This is a laudable decision, as not enough has been said until today about the incredible strength and heroism shown by women during the Holocaust and immediately afterwards. Women who joined their husbands and other members of their families were so meaningful in pulling their next-of-kin through that hell on earth.

When men had lost hope for a future, let alone for a better future, their mothers, sisters, wives, daughters and girlfriends were the ones who instilled in them hope, often in spite of the bitter reality around them.

After the war, the remnants of this catastrophe of the Jewish people had to start their lives and the lives of their relatives from scratch, and made this a promising start.

Women have, throughout our history, been the beacons of hope on whom we could always rely to take leading positions. They had leading positions in the ghettos and the Resistance, in Europe, and in the reborn leadership of the Jewish community both in Israel and in the Diaspora.

So, tonight I have the distinct honor to meet with six individuals, six women who, after having built a new existence, have become so valuable to this community and to the Jewish people.

STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

On ONE DAY in September, The Jewish Community of Toronto pledged $4,950,000 To be Invested in the Success of The State of Israel.

The great success of this year's High Holy Day campaign is, in large measure, due to the commitment and dedication of our many synagogue chairpeople. We publicly thank them for their efforts and take this opportunity to introduce the community to these very special leaders.

Rabbi questions the value of supplementary Hebrew school

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The value of supplementary Hebrew school was questioned by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue at a recent forum on Creating the Jewish Future.

The forum was sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, and chaired by its director, Michael Brown. The rabbi was one of three panelists.

It was also a book launch for Creating the Jewish Future, edited by Brown and Prof. Bernard Lightman.

Instead of supplementary schools, a greater emphasis should be put on Hebrew day schools and preparing well-trained teachers and volunteers for them, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told an audience of 300 at Beth Tzedec.

There is already a significant increase in the number of children attending such full-time day schools, he said.

"The afternoon supplemental Jewish education schools...are held late in the afternoon when kids don't want to be there, when they are tired."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl termed "Jello Jews" the group that should be targeted if there is to be a secure Jewish future. "These are Jews who come out of a mold. Sometimes the mold stands, wobbles or turns to mush."

The role of women is important for the future declared both the rabbi and Elizabeth Wolfe, a Toronto community volunteer and president of Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"The single most marginal group in the Jewish community is women, and one of the most significant aspects of the coming millennium is their legitimate pursuit of serious Jewish studies," said Wolfe.

In Orthodoxy, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, more women are studying Torah, while in Conservative, Reconstructionist and Reform synagogues, more women want to paticipate in services.

Prof. Morton Weinfeld of McGill University said he would like to see a moratorium on the word continuity in any discussion of the Jewish future. "I would change the label and the atmosphere of crisis around it. 'Will your grandchildren be Jewish?' is a call to arms. I would replace it with 'How and why are you being Jewish?'"

Bernard Ghert was honored with a plaque from York University for his role in sponsoring the first conference two years ago, which resulted in publication of Creating the Jewish Future.

Community Matters

Top Team Tackles Campaign Stretch

With just five weeks to go in the community Campaign for Fifty, UJA Federation has selected its most committed campaigners to secure millions of dollars from thousands of donors who have yet to pledge their support.

Campaign for Fifty Vice-Chair Glennie Lindenberg asked the expert canvassers to make as many calls as possible to community members while the campaign momentum is still strong. Over $31 million has been raised so far including $5.5 million of new and increased gifts.

Veteran campaigner Ubby Krakauer says he's prepared to do "whatever it takes." Krakauer, who reports many gift increases in recent months says, "luckily, most of the people I contact want to do the right thing." Other team members include Allan Rabie, Fay Gold, Michael Shiner, David Barkin, Lynn Catzman and Elaine Simkevitz. Howard Price, who is Vice-Chair of the Campaign for Fifty along with Lindenberg and Abe Glowinsky, applauded all of UJA Federation's dedicated volunteers and reminded them of growing Jewish needs in our community and all over the world.

"It's going to be a very cold and bleak winter for Jews living in the economically ravaged former Soviet Union," reported Price. "UJA Federation funded programs are more vital in this part of the world than ever and that's why we're asking for increased giving."

Gordon Wolfe, Executive Director of Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, offered an empowering message - "Tell the person on the other end of the phone that their support will mean no waiting lists for thousands who depend on JF&CS services including the poor and women suffering from abuse."

Wolfe said additional dollars will also help improve the lives of the more than 4,000 Jewish children living in poverty. "They're counting on us," he stressed.

UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty aims to raise $50 million anually by 2001.

"Keep feeding us cards to call" say campaign enthusiasts Robert Solomon (l) and Glen Shear.

Holocaust Education Week

'Ordinary Germans' analyzed

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Large numbers of ordinary Germans who killed Jews during the Holocaust were not simply coerced or following orders; rather they acted with energy and enthusiasm, Daniel Goldhagen said in a recent lecture.

"[German perpetrators] didn't do less than they had to – they did more than they had to. They pursued what they did with enormous zeal," Goldhagen, an associate professor of government and social studies at Harvard University, told a capacity crowd at the Adath Israel Congregation. His lecture was part of UJA Federation's 18th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Goldhagen said his controversial 1996 bestseller, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust, aims to "shift the focus of attention of study of the Holocaust [to] where it rightly should be; namely, on the human beings who committed these crimes."

Before the book's publication, he said, most research focused on the motivations of those at the top of the Nazi regime.

The actual killers, he said, were "moral agents" who chose to kill Jews out of a deep-seated anti-Semitism – "common sense" to most Germans from the mid-19th century onward – that saw Jews as an incalculable evil threat.

Goldhagen said his research, which focused on German police battalion killing units, shows the perpetrators represented a cross-section of German men who were "ordinary Germans in every sense of what it meant to be ordinary in the Germany of the time."

The draftees were typically in their mid-30s, had little martial experience and were not members of the Nazi party. And despite the fact that members of the units could be excused without sanction if they were uncomfortable killing Jews, very few were, Goldhagen said.

The only plausible explanation for the German perpetrators' actions, Goldhagen said, is "that they were anti-Semites of a Hitlerian variety," as were most ordinary Germans who were products of the same political culture.

Genocide

Goldhagen took issue with critics who say his conclusions are controversial. In all other genocides, he noted, it's assumed the perpetrators wanted to kill their victims.

"The only genocide [in which it's claimed] the perpetrators didn't want to do what they did is with the Holocaust and the German perpetrators…The critics are saying this is the only exception we know of," he said.

He stressed his findings do not focus on German national character or genetic predisposition, but on individual guilt and beliefs about Jews, which he said "can and have changed since the end of the war." He also stressed he did not study volunteer units from other nationalities who participated in the killing.

To write his book, Goldhagen relied on two major sources: the accounts of individual survivors and the accounts of thousands of former German police battalion officers investigated by the West German justice ministry in the 1950s.

He said both sets of accounts indicate that "ordinary Germans" who carried out Hitler's orders had "a great hatred for Jews" and were "executioners who believed the slaughter of Jews was right and necessary."

Goldhagen argued against theories which say German perpetrators were simply following orders, were victims of peer pressure, were "good bureaucratic functionaries," or were simply coerced.

The explanations, he said, share a common flaw: They assume the killers disapproved of what they were doing and try to explain how they were made to overcome this disapproval. He said the explanations also assume the police were like automatons that would involuntarily carry out Hitler's orders as if part of a machine.

Goldhagen rejected the theories on empirical grounds, since they don't explain why such large numbers of Germans participated directly in the killing – about 100,000, he estimates – nor do they account for "the immense cruelty and brutality which they visited on their victims."

Explanations of the perpetrators' actions must also account for what he called "a constituent feature of the Holocaust," namely the large number of photographs the Germans took "to immortalize their deeds."

The photographs typically depict scenes in which Jews were symbolically humiliated, as in the recurring image of old men being forcibly shaved at gunpoint. Goldhagen noted the pictures – taken in direct contravention of orders not to record the killing – circulated widely and found their way into albums confiscated as evidence by German authorities in the 1950s.

Goldhagen is currently working on a book about genocide in the 20th century.

German Jews called 'forgotten victims' of Holocaust

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — German Jews – 600,000 strong before World War II – are the "forgotten victims" of the Holocaust, a community-wide commemoration on the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht heard last week.

The Night of Broken Glass, on Nov. 9-10, 1938, signalled the beginning of the end for European Jewry, and the Jews of Germany became Adolf Hitler's earliest victims, keynote speaker Gerda Frieberg, a witness to the historic pogrom, told about 800 people at Beth Emeth Synagogue.

"Kristallnacht ended justice and humanity," said Frieberg, a concentration camp survivor and well-known Holocaust educator. "It was the night on which the 1,000-year history of Jews in Germany came to an end."

The shooting death of a minor official by a Jewish youth at the Germany embassy in Paris was used by the Nazis as a pretext to strike against the country's Jews. The following night, across Germany, throngs of angry mobs led by stormtroopers, whipped up by anti-Jewish propaganda, went on a rampage, smashing Jewish-owned shop windows, torching synagogues, ransacking homes and beating Jews.

It was the shattered plate glass that gave the pogrom its famous name.

When it was all over, 297 synagogues were burned, 7,000 businesses destroyed, and 30,000 Jews were rounded up for deportation, all under the watch of local police and Nazi thugs. And the government collected on all insurance policies.

Ninety-one Jews had been murdered. "They were the first victims of the Holocaust," Frieberg remarked.

Jews were then made to clean up the streets, and to add insult to injury, were forced to make "reparations" to the state worth one billion Reichmarks, she noted.

At the time, Frieberg's family lived in Breslau, which became part of Poland in 1922. But she recalls crossing the nearby border on that night to witness a synagogue on fire.

"The Torah scrolls lay smouldering outside. The leather-bound prayer books were still burning."

Thousands of anti-Jewish laws and measures, enacted within two years of Hitler's election, paved the way to Kristallnacht, Frieberg said.

Today, rebuilt German synagogues "are empty. But for us survivors, a synagogue is not just blocks and bricks. It is a victory over the Nazis."

Six other witnesses to Kristallnacht lit memorial candles, and dramatic songs were rendered by cantors Louis Danto and David Bagley.

The solemn ceremony marked the end of Holocaust Education Week in Toronto.

Kuti Gershoni. Sheer Determination.

'Do you know how I deal with the frustration of my disabilities? I jog myself to exhaustion.' says Kuti Gershoni.

On November 2, 1969, Kuti was summoned to dismantle a mine. As he carefully lowered himself to the ground, there was an earsplitting noise. Kuti felt like he was hit by an express train. Everything was pitch dark ... he could not see or hear ... except for a shrieking sound that filled the air. Both hands were blown off; he was blinded, his hearing was irreparably damaged. Life would never be the same again.

But Kuti is a fighter and was determined not to give up. After extensive surgery he began his rehabilitation at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. Together with the support of his wife and family, he received his Ph.D from Hebrew University, where he is now head of Eastern and African Studies. Kuti is currently a visiting Professor at Boston University.

'Society forgets and doesn't know how to deal with the disabled' he says. 'It was only at Beit Halochem that I could go with my family, and together, I could learn to be a whole person again.'

'Camp sister' bonds continued after liberation: archivist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Women in concentration camps often formed unique, sisterly relationships, says the archivist for the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York.

"This phenomenon of unrelated women bonding, calling each other sisters and sustaining the relationship after the war, is unique to women," Bonnie Gurewitsch said at a recent Holocaust Education Week lecture.

There were instances of men becoming close, she said, "but they did not label their relationships."

Women arrived at the camps feeling totally alone, and trusting no one except themselves, said Gurewitsch.

"They found other women, however, and made a commitment to them. These relationships formed family units that were more tightly knit than many natural ones. Their efforts to stay together created very strong bonds.The relationships were a substitute for their own families, which had been destroyed."

Each time a person tried to protect another prisoner, she said, that person risked her life.

She said there is no explanation for why certain women were able to overcome their mistrust of others, and bond with other women. "There is no accounting for chemistry. Some women, however, came from the same town and shared a cultural frame of reference.

"When these women were hairless and dressed in ill-fitting rags, they recognized each other and knew that they faced the same trauma.They shared a value system which became a spiritual and emotional support in a hostile environment. Even without possessions, clothes or body hair, they did not see each other as dehumanized.

"In such difficult times, these women lived in harmony. They would sit together and act as if they would come out alive, even though [inwardly] they did not believe it. They believed that by treating each other nicely, they could make life bearable. They created a social haven from the irrational chaos of the camp.They clung to one another to keep from being engulfed by the horrors."

Some women kept track of the Jewish calendar, said Gurewitsch, while others said prayers. "They drew strength from sharing religious experiences. When things looked hopeless, they repeated words of wisdom."

The camp sister relationship did not end with liberation, she said. "These same camp sisters cared for each other afterwards, and nursed each other back to health. The bonds strengthened in the aftermath of the Holocaust, when they had to heal their bodies and spirits."

Even those who have been separated geographically still speak to each other and visit often, said Gurewitsch. "They see in themselves a continuation of pre-war Jewry that had been destroyed. They do not see each other as refugees."

The lecture was sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation and National Council of Jewish Women.

Israel makes strides despite conflict: author

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Most of Israel's achievements have been made in the teeth of conflict, says Sir Martin Gilbert, author of Israel: A History (Turner Books).

"Few, if any, nations have been threatened with extinction the day they became a nation," Gilbert said at a lecture sponsored by the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation, on the opening night of the Jewish Book Fair.

Furthermore, no other state found itself, on the day of its independence, besieged with people who wanted to live there, said Gilbert, the official biographer of Sir Winston Churchill.

"In 1948, hundreds of thousands of Holocaust survivors and Jews from Arab lands came to Israel, and the country had to accept them all. No state has ever doubled its population and then brought in more than its own numbers, in its early stages."

More recently, he said, immigration has also caused internal struggle. "It puts enormous burdens on the economy, and it causes animosity amongst people. Every group of immigrants resents the group that comes after it. Each group has grievances about how it is characterized."

The Sephardi population, he said, still has grievances about the way it was treated in the early days of its immigration. "It has built up a sense that the parents and grandparents have been treated as second class citizens."

The Sephardim have found a strong political vehicle in the Shas party, said Gilbert. "The party stands for political goals and a comprehensive internal social welfare system. It is not a Sephardi pressure group, but rather, a comprehensive and impressive organization."

Other areas of internal conflict, said Gilbert, include the struggle between the Haredim and the rest of the Israeli people. "An ugly divide has emerged. Israel newspapers show pictures of police clashing with men in black hats."

In addition, Israel is one of the only nations, that has to live with terror as a daily part of its life, Gilbert said. "The mental anguish is palpable. It is appalling to be there on the day of a bomb attack."

But perhaps the most important struggle of all, said Gilbert, is that between Jew and Jew. "[Yitzhak] Rabin's assassination has traumatized many areas of Israel's society. It is unpleasant indeed to hear news commentators remarking that there is a prospect of civil war in Israel."

He said conflict seems to be Israel's perpetual state, "but however much the conflict, it has remained a light unto the nations.

"To this day, Israel has not forgotten the crucial support given by Machal [outside volunteers] during the War of Independence. Rabin attended Machal reunions every year, and told them that his generation will never forget what they did. This is the link between Israel and the Diaspora – one of the sustaining factors in Israel's struggles."

Rabbi ReVisions the Torah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Torah has always been experienced through male eyes, says Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"The religious experience of women has rarely been the lens through which Judaism is seen; what is perceived as legitimate," she said at the launch of her first book, ReVisions; seeing Torah through a feminist lens, (Key Porter Books), part of this year's Jewish Book Fair.

It is not wrong to cling to traditional religious commitment or to religious faith, she told the overflow crowd at Leah Posluns Theatre, calling the Torah "my family's spiritual diary, even if I don't like all the entries." But, she said in an emotional address, many women share her dilemna – "I love a system that has not always loved me back."

As a feminist and as a Jew, Rabbi Goldstein said, she feels marginalized as both. Quoting from her book, she said "I love Torah, but hate the sexism. I love its ethical qualities, its demands for justice, its care for the underdog. I hate where daughters are mistreated, and women are ignored."

The ambivalence mirrors the two creation stories in Genesis, she said. While everyone learns about what Rabbi Goldstein called "the rib!", where God puts Adam to sleep, and creates woman out of his rib, the first version, where man and woman are created from the same earth, "born equal as a gift of a genderless God," is ignored, she said.

She charged that the passages in Torah relating to childbirth and menstruation "make it hard to see the sacredness in them." Comparing the laws of family purity as they apply to women, with circumcision, she said that it appears that "women's blood defiles, but men's blood sanctifies."

The attitude reinforces the stereotypes of the "bad" and "good" woman, where the bad is sensual, and the good ignores her physicality, she said.

Once women ("and women-loving men") see the dichotomy, "can we remain faithful to a patriarchal religion?"

Rabbi Goldstein urged concerned Jews to "offer differences," such as creating new ways to celebrate the menstrual cycle, change language of prayers to reflect both the male and female aspects of God, to bring women into the mainstream of religious life.

She cited as examples that in most Conservative synagogues in Toronto, women are still not called up to the Torah except on their bat mitzvah, if at all, that the two female mohelot get far less business than their male counterparts, and that at the meetings of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, "I am not counted as a mezumin at benching in my own organization."

She rejected the notion that women should exhibit patience at the slow pace of change. "Five thousand years is long enough [to wait]," she said.

Women can take action to empower themselves spiritually, she said. Joking that they should "storm the bimah" to insist on participation in the synagogue ritual, Rabbi Goldstein suggested that women who are denied the opportunity to say Kaddish in a male minyan could form women's prayer groups or minyanim so that they can do so.

In reply to a question from the audience, Rabbi Goldstein said that she believes that the Jewish revulsion against paganism has stopped serious consideration of the female aspects of God.

She questioned whether limiting God to His male aspects only, renders Him "limited," rather than all-encompassing.

Jews must value people struggling with feminism in the Orthodox, chassidic or traditional worlds, she said, as well as continuing a dialogue with those who have less liberal attitudes.

"We can agree to disagree, so long as it is with respect for each other," she urged.

Toronto Star columnist Michelle Landsberg, a special guest at the evening, said that she "felt the profound injustice of patriarchism and sexism" in Jewish life and practice early in her life.

You discover, she said, that "your brother has a bar mitzvah but you don't count; that you have to sit behind a mechitzah, that prayers are saturated in words of male majesty, but you are not entitled to take part anyway, that you are not allowed to say Kaddish."

After a particularly upsetting visit to a Mea Shearim synagogue, she determined that "if the synagogue is the source of bigotry, I would never set foot in a shul with separate seating again. And I never have."

Family land quest frustrates heirs

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto man is discovering just how thick Israeli red tape can be.

Mark Budman is having a difficult time proving that his family is the rightful heir to land his great-grandfather bought in Palestine in 1934.

Budman, a 32-year-old systems administrator, has spent thousands of dollars on an Israeli lawyer and has supplied Israeli courts and government departments with affidavits, petitions and probate orders – all to no avail.

"The government has asked for all kinds of documentation, and then doesn't recognize it," an exasperated Budman told The CJN, displaying dozens of letters and papers. "They say they are missing papers, and that they don't have what I have sent them.

"It's just been tons of red tape."

In the meantime, funds from the sale of the land are sitting in an Israeli trust account and are being whittled away by administrative fees.

Budman's story begins in 1934, when his great-grandfather, Abraham Solomin, bought 42 dunams (about 10 acres) of land in Yokneam, near Haifa, from the Palestine Land Development Company. Solomin, an ardent Zionist, had bought the tract from his home near Vilna, Lithuania, and registered half of it to his son, Moshe.

But both Solomins and their families were murdered in a Nazi aktion in November, 1941. No one left a will.

A decade later in Montreal, Moshe's brother, Lipo Solomin, laid claim to the land. In 1963, so did a distant relative living in Israel. The courts there awarded her one-third of the tract, but nothing else happened for years.

Lipo Solomin, Budman's great-uncle, died in 1971, and the matter was dormant until 1996, when Budman found himself in Israel on a study program.

"I was curious," he says, and headed to the Nazareth Lands Authority office armed with the lot parcel numbers.

He discovered that the government had seized control of the land in the 1960s, and that sometime after 1988, it sold four of the five lots at auction to a private owner. One small lot was given to the Jewish National Fund.

The government had placed the proceeds from the sale – about 121,000 shekels – into an escrow account. However, the sum is not tied to inflation, and administrative fees are eating into it.

"The whole purpose of this is not the money, but family curiosity," Budman insists.

He hired an Israeli lawyer a year ago, but he says the government is thwarting his case through inefficiency and bureaucratic torpor.

"The government isn't denying that my great-grandfather purchased the land," Budman says. "Proving we're the rightful heirs is the issue."

He says the government has thrown up all kinds of obstacles: "They say they've lost or misplaced things. They want documents they already have copies of. They won't even say how much is in the account."

Budman's battle is with the justice ministry's Administrator General, which has been inundated with thousands of similar requests ever since Israel succumbed to public pressure last year and published lists of property and bank accounts reportedly belonging to some 10,000 Holocaust victims and their heirs.

He says the whole episode "still brings family members to tears.

"I'm not sorry I started this, but I am sorry Israel has been so difficult to deal with."

Budman says he would like to hear from other Canadians who have laid to claim to Holocaust-era assets in Israel. He can be reached at 483-1360 or at [budman@generation.net].

Quebec faced with conservative options

The second issue is the undeniable trend to the right. Both leaders are conservative, Bouchard somewhat so and Charest to a much greater extent. Yet, when Charest let the cat out of the bag by praising Harris, he faced an outcry sufficient to force him to beat a retreat.

Since that incident, he has promised massive spending of completely hypothetical funds. Not to be outdone, Bouchard has engaged in a spending auction with him. Both claim that through some miracle, this would not endanger the "sacred" goal of "deficit zero."

The reality is similar to the one on the constitutional issue. The majority of Quebecers is not right wing at all. We are a society that believes in compassion and solidarity. Like other social-democratic societies, we know that we have spending limits, but we certainly do not want to reduce the role of the state in providing social justice.

The tragedy of this election is that a social-democratic society is being given two conservative options, one of which, represented by Charest, is a little more strident than the other.

The third issue is the low intellectual level of the debate. We have been used to a falling standard in many jurisdictions, but this campaign, with systematic camouflage practised by both parties and the unseemly "spending auctions," is proof that modern politicians will say anything at all to win.

The final issue is the difficult position the electorate faces with this type of campaign. The anglophones, frightened by the close outcome of the last referendum, have become the captive public of Charest. Even left-wingers are prepared to vote for him, some without illusions and some clinging to the hope that he will prove a compassionate conservative. Francophone federalists who are not socially conservative face a terrible dilemma, having to choose between a sovereigntist, conservative option and a federalist, more conservative one.

It is unhealthy for the anglophones to be marginalized in this way. It is equally unhealthy that the opinions held by most Quebecers in favor of some form of special status but not sovereignty, and in favor of real social justice, are given short shrift by the politicians.

CJC claims college breaches guidelines of Ontario law. The school was allowed to grant only diplomas or certificates.

Then education minister Richard Allen stated the college was not authorized to grant any degrees in Ontario, and pledged it would be made to comply with provincial law.

This time, Tory MPP Jim Brown is drafting a bill that would amend the law and accredit the college to grant full-fledged undergraduate and graduate degrees.

Brown, who represents Scarborough West, was unavailable for comment last week.

Charles McVety, president of the college, denied the school proselytizes to Jews.

The program is "purely a theological exercise [to] understand the roots of Christianity, which are in the Old Testament," he told The CJN.

He said there are "no courses of any type" which minister specifically to Jews.

"We have lots of Jewish friends, and we're not happy with the misunderstanding this has caused. We're very respectful of not training people to target any group."

Bagel Club reaches out to B.C. Jews with disabilities

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Bagel Club, a social club for Jews in the Lower Mainland who have developmental and physical disabilities, is looking for new members.

Formed three years ago, the club gets 10 to 12 committed regulars for its once-a-month meetings at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver (JCC).

Lyle Lexier, one of the Bagel Club's charter members, says he'd like to see the Bagel Club expand. "I'd like us to have 20 members," he says. "And more meetings – twice a month."

David Benbaruj, a member for 2½ years, is also bullish on the Bagel Club. "I want more members and to go on more outings."

The club's members, mostly men between 35 and 55 with disorders like autism, aphasia and epilepsy, do more than just nosh on bagels at their Monday evening get-togethers. Bagel Club activities include celebrating Jewish holidays, going on outings and picnics, watching videos, storytelling and hanging out in the club's regular meeting room at the JCC.

The club's name was chosen by member Jory Fisher, after a similar (now defunct) group in Toronto.

Volunteer facilitator Pixie Steiner says adults with disabilities have a problem being accepted in the Jewish community. "The community doesn't know how to treat them, and they're not made welcome. I want attitudes to change."

It's important for Bagel Club members to know they belong somewhere, she says. "The club is a familiar group with Jewish content and activities... All the members know they're Jewish and it's important to them. They don't take their Jewishness for granted."

They don't take their Jewishness for granted

Sally Rogow, a Bagel Club volunteer facilitator and a professor emerita of the University of British Columbia's Faculty of Education, says the club is unique.

"What makes our group special is the pride of the members in having their own social club, their acceptance and support of one another, their appreciation of the helpers, and their honesty and openness," Rogow says.

Members rarely miss meetings, she says. "They celebrate one another's birthdays and other personal events, exchange personal information and support one another in their quest to live normal and productive lives.

"The members are... non-judgmental, non-critical and supportive. When somebody needs something, somebody else will help them."

Volunteer facilitator Debbie Havusha, a York University graduate who is originally from Ottawa, says her "dream is for the members of the Bagel Club to play a productive role in the Jewish community.

"I think they have much to give the community. For example, I can see the Bagel Club helping to sponsor a public community event with speakers."

Bagel Club regulars include Craig Beckman, Robert Beckman, David Benbaruj, Claudia Burke, Steven Cynader, Fred Dexall, Annie Eskenazy, Mark Estrin, Jory Fisher, Lyle Lexier and Trevor Minster.

For more information on the Bagel Club, contact Lyle Lexier at 604-436-2660 or [lylelexier@lexier.com].

Ottawa's new imam honored by shul

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time, an imam – a Muslim spiritual leader – was the guest of honor at a synagogue here.

Sheik Gamal Solaiman, the new imam of an Ottawa mosque, and Dr. Mukhtar Malik, president of the Ottawa Muslim Association, were guests at a recent Congregation Machzikei Hadas breakfast.

"This is the first occasion in the history of our community that the imam has visited a Jewish congregation. It is a historic moment," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka in introducing the guests.

"I hope that this is just the beginning of forging links between our community and the Muslim community here and across Canada," Rabbi Bulka said.

Imam Solaiman quoted from the Koran and emphasized the many interests and causes that the Jewish and Muslim communities share.

Although this occasion was a first in Ottawa, he said, it was far from a first in his own experience. In England, where he lived before coming to Canada, Imam Solaiman said he "shared a platform, on hundreds of occasions, with rabbis."

He is acquainted with both the present and past chief rabbis of England and has lectured at the Leo Baeck College, he said.

Without making light of the fact that Jews and Muslims have their differences, Imam Solaiman said, "These differences should not be obstacles or hindrances for people of good will, civilized people.

"Whether it is fighting hunger, discrimination or terrorism, there is a great deal that people can do together... Let us cooperate together on those questions which are of mutual concern to all of us."

Imam Solaiman thanked Rabbi Bulka and the members of the congregation for their invitation and indicated that his community would reciprocate when their new mosque is built.

President Hymie Reichstein thanked the sheik and presented him with a gift from the congregation.

Kristallnacht remembered

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 150 people, one of the largest gatherings in recent memory, recently congregated at the Cenotaph at Halifax Grand Parade to commemorate the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Led by Federal NDP leader Alexa McDonough and Nova Scotia Lieutenant Governor James Kinley, who lit memorial candles, the men, women and children from the Jewish and secular community held candles, heard speeches and sang Oh Canada and Hatikvah on a cool, clear night.

"Besides remembering the victims of one of the most horrid periods of history, we're here to affirm the better qualities of humanity on Dignity Day," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC). "Our program serves the following objectives: To affirm the better qualities of human nature, stand against intolerance, and remember Nazism's victims."

Leigh Lampert, a Dalhousie University law student, representing the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) said, "Today, it is unfortunate we still see violence, bombings and hate crimes throughout the world. We must bring an end to hatred and bigotry. We must speak out against those who are bigots."

Four Halifax students – Debra Freeman, Aaron Ginsburg, Lauren Abrahams and Sarah Barkow – who walked the March of the Living last spring, presented a verbal history of Kristallnacht.

Bill Gibson, a non-Jew from Halifax, an RCAF pilot shot down and imprisoned in Buchenwald, was among several diginitaries lighting memorial candles at the Cenotaph.

Orthodox rebbitzen displays paintings at gallery

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — It may come as a surprise to learn that artist Simma Krames Goldreich,whose paintings are currently on view at the Gallery on the Bay, is an Orthodox rebbitzen.

Toronto-born and Hamilton-raised, Goldreich, 28, the middle of three children of Lester and Carol Krames, is married to Rabbi Yechiel Goldreich, a teacher at the Yeshiva of Hamilton-Irving Zucker College of Jewish Studies, and the mother of two girls aged three and one.

Goldreich remembers always drawing "when I was very little. But then I stopped and only went back to it when I went away to college."

She returned here after several years of studying and teaching in New York, where she obtained an MA in fine arts from Stern College and studied painting and drawing at the Brooklyn College of Art.

Goldreich finds that "being back in Hamilton has been so good for me…being away from everything, with no one to tell me what to do."

She shut herself up in the basement of her home and worked "in isolation. I needed to be alone," she says. After two years, she felt ready to show her paintings.

A dozen large canvasses and about 10 small still lifes make up the show entitled Icons of the Heart. In contrast to her earlier work, which dealt mostly with the Holocaust (a number of these toured North America, Europe and Israel from 1994 to 1998 as part of the M. Blajchman Collection of Holocaust memorabilia), her new collection reveals a very different Goldreich: bold, imaginative, enigmatic.

She works with acrylics and her paintings are large and striking, sometimes disturbing, sometimes humorous, invariably interesting, and often reminiscent of old black and white movie stills and the era of art deco.

She does collages, sometimes cutting up her own paintings and adding pictures from magazines, newspaper clippings or anything else that takes her fancy, developing her ideas as she goes along. And she likes to work from old black and white photographs, cutting them up and rearranging the pieces in a collage that she then uses as a model for a painting.

"You have to take risks, go with your ideas, your intuition," she says.

The still lifes, on the other hand, are charming little pieces titled Vessels – two or three jugs in various compositions and backgrounds.

Prices for Goldreich's paintings range $75 to $2,500; seven of them were sold within a couple of days of the show's opening.

The exhibition continues at the Gallery on the Bay, 231 Bay St. North, Hamilton, 905-540-8532, until Nov. 22.

Women discuss Talmud in Montreal Hillel House

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If you happen to be in the Hillel House and see a group of young women in animated intellectual discourse, feel free to join in.

You'll be a welcome addition to what is being touted as the first student program in Montreal where Jewish young women from all observance levels discuss the Talmud in the same vibrant but intellectually disciplined manner as in a yeshiva.

Called Ashrei Yoshvei Baitecha (We joyously sit in your house), the Beit Midrash L'Banot program began this fall inside the Hillel House on Stanley Street.

"This is something unique to the city," said Sara Miller, a 19-year-old Judaic Studies student who is one of the program's facilitators.

"To be able to read a Judaic text by yourself – it's like a light-bulb going off in a comic strip."

According to Miller and to Shira Fine, 24, Hillel's director at Concordia University and John Abbott College, this is the main reason for the program's attraction.

There have been other study programs for women in the city, but Fine and Miller say this is the first one to approach it with a textual, instead of a lecturing, style.

> 'This is something unique to the city'

What makes it unique is that the program uses the yeshiva practice of chavrutah, in which students are paired up, with one usually a bit more knowledgeable than the other, to allow for individual and even free-wheeling interchange.

In that way, participants truly "get into" their talmudic texts, using give-and-take exchanges with the class leader and with each other.

One big difference here is that for the neophyte or even not-at-all Hebrew-reader, texts are available with English translation on the facing page.

The classes have included discussion and study of the 613 mitzvot, the Book of Judges and Gemarah.

The program began after Miller and a friend of hers, Tobi Leibman, returned from periods of yeshiva study in Israel.

Late last winter, Miller and Leibman were lamenting the fact that Montreal had no real opportunities for textual study for women.

Leibman mentioned the same thing to another friend, Chava Shimon, who suggested that Leibman organize classes led by rabbis and/or teachers.

When Leibman got back to her, Miller went to Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, who loved the idea, and eventually contacted Judaic scholar Norma Joseph, who has led her own Torah-study classes for women.

Joseph approached Fine to seek the use of the Hillel House as a relaxed setting for the classes, and with a grant from Hillel's student initiatives committee in Washington, D.C., the Beit Midrash L'Banot was born on Sept. 23.

The program has had about 15 students from all denominational backgrounds register so far for the four classes per week.

Although the program, which costs $15, is intended primarily for young women students, Fine and Miller are encouraging others to join, such as women who work downtown but who might want to attend a class during a break in their day.

More information on the Beit Midrash L'Banot is available by contacting Fine, at 845-9171, or through her e-mail address, at [hillel.montreal.qc.ca].

Palestinians jeopardizing Oslo: Netanyahu

By DAVID MAKOVSKY and YERAH TAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Repeated Palestinian statements about unilateral declarations of statehood on May 4 could lead to the "collapse of the Oslo agreements," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the cabinet, while Palestinian leaders warned that if Israeli land expropriations continue in the West Bank, the Palestinians will seek retaliation in the UN.

"We will ensure that the Palestinians adhere to what has been imposed upon them," said Netanyahu. "If they do not implement, we will not adhere [to Oslo]...The declarations of [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat and the heads of the Palestinian Authority (PA) demonstrate their willingness to bring down the Oslo agreements," the prime minister said.

"We cannot fulfil agreements when the other side, shortly after it receives land, declares it will violate the Wye agreements," he added.

Speaking to Fatah members in Ramallah yesterday, Arafat said, "Our great intifadah went on for seven years. If they [the Israelis] don't want to continue on the path of peace, we will start it all over again, but I tell them we have made the peace of the brave out of conviction."

He called on Israel to understand that a Palestinian state would be a bridge to peace in the region.

Before meeting with U.S. special Middle East envoy Dennis Ross, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon reiterated that if the Palestinians unilaterally declare statehood, Israel "reserves the right" to effectively annex the remainder of the West Bank under its control.

Government sources said the prime minister is to receive a report from the Shin Bet security service on whether the PA has jailed 10 of the 30 suspected terrorists who are allegedly free. Israel sees this as a condition for its willingness to pull back from part of the territory after a special cabinet meeting. Israel in turn is to release 250 of 750 Palestinian prisoners it agreed to free from prison.

Ross met with Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, and arranged a meeting between Cabinet secretary Danny Naveh and Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat. But Ross, who has said he is not here to negotiate, is expected to leave tomorrow, leaving his deputy, Aaron Miller, in the area to oversee implementation.

Arafat's deputy, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), said in Moscow that the Palestinians were committed to refrain from making a unilateral declaration of Palestinian independence on May 4, 1999, but only on condition that Israel refrains from taking unilateral measures, such as establishing settlements or expropriating lands from the Palestinians.

British rabbi criticized

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — It's not easy being Britain's chief rabbi.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks is at the centre of a communal controversy over his decision to attend a reception to mark the 50th birthday of Prince Charles last Friday evening.

Rabbi Sacks, head of the mainstream Orthodox United Synagogues movement, made the 30-minute journey to Buckingham Palace on foot from the Marble Arch synagogue in London's West End.

He defended his decision on the grounds that it was established protocol for chief rabbis to accept direct royal invitations.

While conceding that "the importance of keeping Shabbat together with the family is fundamental," Sacks said that "we only make an exception [for the] expression of Jewish loyalty to the country and its head of state."

As chief rabbi, he would "always accept invitations from the Queen on state occasions," adding that "Prince Charles has long been a friend of the Jewish community and recently showed his support by attending a service to mark Israel's 50th anniversary."

Just before the event, he said he would attend the palace reception only to pay his respects to the royal family and then leave to spend the rest of the Sabbath with his wife.

"Buckingham Palace has been marvelous in understanding the limitations," he said.

Concern that Rabbi Sacks had accepted an invitation to attend the birthday party of the heir to the British throne on Shabbat was expressed in a stream of letters to the editor of the London Jewish Chronicle.

"I would never contemplate attending a function and leaving my wife on a Friday night," wrote Ronald Michaels. "I believe that we are taught to remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy."

Israel still wary about Iraqi deal

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has "no illusions about Saddam Hussein's intentions," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement after President Bill Clinton said the resolution of the crisis depended upon UN inspectors returning to their jobs.

The statement added that Saddam's "willingness to live up to his commitments is in doubt and therefore we must continue to follow developments and be ready for every possibility in the future."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai sounded a more upbeat note, saying that Israel hopes the return of UN inspectors to their regular work "will permit significant monitoring that will prevent the development and production of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles.

"We believe and know that the United States, the UN and the nations of the world will do all in order to prevent creation of such dangers to the region."

At the cabinet meeting last weekend, Netanyahu said he told Clinton during their phone conversation last week, that even though Israel is not a part of this crisis, "Israel is responsible for vouchsafing for the security of its citizens and therefore it reserves the absolute right for self-defence."

During the cabinet meeting, Tourism Minister Moshe Katzav complained about the U.S. travel warning to Israel, calling it "hasty and needless."

Modern Orthodox re-examine role of movement

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Modern Orthodox leaders in Israel are trying to launch a movement to build bridges across the widening religious-secular gulf.

Some 200 Israeli rabbis, academics and activists gathered last month at Kibbutz Lavi in the Galilee to rethink the role of religious Zionism and modern Orthodoxy in Israel.

It has been 23 years since a similar conference was held. Although the organizers of the recent meeting said it was apolitical, they appeared to be motivated by several trends affecting the modern Orthodox:

• the shift by the National Religious Party (NRP) – the religious Zionist party – from a moderating political force to one of the most steadfast opponents of land-for-peace deals with the Palestinians;

• haredi groups gaining political power while successfully luring many secular Jews and modern Orthodox towards Judaic fundamentalism;

• the increasing permissiveness of Israeli secular culture, which makes it much more difficult to reconcile Orthodoxy and modernity and is also persuading many young people to remove their yarmulkas.

Organizers insisted the convention was intended to promote unity on social and religious issues among the modern Orthodox who make up about 10 percent of Israel's Jewish population. Pessimistic participants, however, fear the gathering, which wrestled with such issues as the role of women in Orthodox Jewish life, may actually further divide the community.

Most participants support Meimad

While politics were not on the agenda, organizers acknowledged that more participants were supporters of Meimad, the small, centre-left modern Orthodox movement that supports trading land for peace with the Palestinians, than of the NRP, the political backbone of West Bank settlers.

In its early years, the NRP was a moderate political force that often formed alliances with Labor-led governments. Its transformation into a far-right group during the past 20 years, say experts, has also weakened its influence as a moderating force on social and religious issues.

There are few moderate Orthodox members in the current Knesset, but there are some 14 haredi Knesset members. And the NRP's nine members focus almost exclusively on holding back the peace process.

Rabbi Yehuda Amital, head of the Gush Etzion Yeshiva and a Meimad founder, chose to discuss politics in his address opening the conference, despite the organizers' intentions. He lashed out at the use of Halachah to justify political goals, such as opposition to the Oslo peace accords.

"It doesn't take a lot of imagination to think what may happen in a young person's mind when these beliefs are shaken," he said, referring to the transfer of West Bank land to Palestinian rule.

"In the eyes of the younger generation, the Halachah in its entirety has become something that has no connection with reality," said Rabbi Amital, who was a minister without portfolio in the previous government of Shimon Peres.

The transformation of Halachah into "dangerous slogans" that fail to emphasize traditional Judaic values, Rabbi Amital said, has created a severe crisis of faith among religious youth.

Nevertheless, the Lavi talks remained focused on social-religious issues, and after three days of discussions, participants agreed that:

• Orthodox-secular relations must undergo a fundamental change, aimed at forging unity instead of trying to attract secular Jews to Orthodoxy;

• Orthodox rabbinic leaders must complement their training with a broader education and deal with social issues such as domestic violence and socio-economic disparities;

• Orthodox solutions must be found to reconcile the changing role of women in the modern world.

According to Menachem Friedman, sociology professor at Bar-Ilan University and an expert on Israeli Orthodoxy, the push by women to attain a larger role in Jewish life will make it virtually impossible to promote unity within Israel's modern Orthodox community.

Neo-Nazi grounded

By ZOHAR BLUMENKRANZ and DALIA SHEHORI,
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The head of a German nationalist extremist organization was prevented from boarding a Lufthansa flight to Israel yesterday after the Interior Ministry announced he would be refused entry to Israel.

The case began last week, when Joachim Siegrist, head of the group German Conservatives, was scheduled to head a delegation of 33 right wingers to Israel. The group included Third Reich veterans, young nationalists and senior representatives of the extreme right in Germany.

While the group's plane was in the air, Israeli authorities informed Lufthansa that it would not allow the delegation to enter Israel. Lufthansa landed the plane in Istanbul and let the group disembark. Siegrist was not among the passengers.

Siegrist apparently decided to travel alone and made reservations for a flight from Frankfurt to Tel Aviv. Last week, Lufthansa was informed by the Israeli Embassy in Bonn that Siegrist was trying to come to Israel on another Lufthansa flight.

The Interior Ministry continued to refuse his entry.

In light of Israel's statement, Lufthansa's legal department informed Siegrist that he would not be allowed to embark on the flight.

Jerusalem hosts GA

On tap, were seminars, interactive workshops, lectures and field trips throughout Israel to view first-hand the key social issues facing the Jewish state, as well as the programs and facilities set up to address them.

Staple agenda items from previous GAs, such as fundraising strategies and professional development, took a back seat to discussions on Israel and Israel-Diaspora relations.

One area to come in for discussion was directing funds raised in North America for use in specific projects in Israel. Although more of an issue in the United States than in Canada, agency professionals have witnessed a recent trend where donors ask that the money they contribute to community fundraising campaigns "go to programs that are [their] priorities," Maerov said. "There is a growing need for donors to feel a link to the recipients...and to be part of the decision-making process."

Delegates will address other key issues, including religious diversity in Israel; policy and planning on the environment; senior care; civil rights, Jewish values and the law; and building economic bridges between Israel and North America.

"The whole objective is for us to hear from Israelis where they're going and to hear from them how they'd like us to help them," he said. North American delegates can also learn much from Israelis, particularly on educational matters dealing with Jewish and Zionist identity. "They can help us sharpen our curricula," Maerov said.

"We're looking at different issues as it affects Israeli society," said Janice Langer, president of the Jewish Women's Federation. "Personally, I'd like to see how they deal with women's interests. I look forward to participating in that discussion. We as Jews can sit down and talk as equal partners."

"In terms of issues," said American UJA President Richard Wexler, the GA "deals with...the real relationship for the 21st century for North American Jewry and the Jews of Israel."

That relationship will be codified at the final event of the GA when each of the participants will sign a covenant stating their communities' intention to fortify and maintain Jewish unity worldwide. Jews around the world will be able to sign on via the Internet at [www.ga98.org].

The GA, also known as "the parliament of the Jewish people," is the largest annual gathering of North American Jewish communal life. It is being held for the first time in Israel to help celebrate the Jewish State's 50th birthday and to symbolize the significant contributions of North American Jews to building the state.

Some Canadian delegates have scheduled side trips both before and after the GA. The Toronto contingent will visit Kiev, capital of Ukraine, for two days prior to the assembly. There, they will meet with potential olim, visit seniors and students studying Hebrew and participate in a ceremony at Babi Yar, the site of a Nazi massacre of Jews.

wind of the conference while in Ottawa for a round of get-acquainted meetings with parliamentarians. He brought the proposed news conference to the attention of Multiculturalism Minister Hedy Fry, who in turn discussed it with other MPs. All parties quickly agreed to a motion barring Zundel from parliament for the remainder of the session. Instead of a press conference in the heart of parliament, Zundel held a media scrum in the sidewalk outside the building.

Government House leader Don Boudria called Zundel's suit "a little odd to say the least." He questioned the legitimacy of the legal action, saying "you can't sue parliament or for how a person votes in parliament. Otherwise, parliament cannot function."

While the suit "didn't stop me from sleeping," Boudria said he had referred the issue to parliament's legal counsel. He expected other MPs would do the same.

Ronen said he relished the opportunity to lock horns with Zundel in a legal setting. He has instructed Congress' legal counsel to study the suit with a view to issuing a counter-claim against Zundel.

"If he wants to litigate, we're prepared to litigate on all the issues. He'll find himself in a position to answer tough questions that we'll ask," Ronen said.

Although "there does not appear to be serious grounds that are actionable [by Zundel]...our position is that he is continually in breech of the right of Canadians and in breach of the Criminal Code provisions on hate promotion," Ronen said.

Congress, Ronen acknowledged, did try "to prevent Zundel from using parliament as a springboard for his hate."

That is consistent with Congress' goal of "preventing him from exercising his determination to spread hate and intolerance. It's a fundamental obligation of our right as a human rights organization, and it's completely within the framework of Canadian society, its interests, the Criminal Code and human rights legislation," he said.

If the situation were to repeat itself, he'd do it again, Ronen added.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 7 • November 19, 1998

Hello! How are ya'? What's cooking? I can't believe how fast the days are flying off the calendar. It's Grey Cup time in Canada and Thanksgiving in the U.S.A. (and it's almost Chanukah, to boot). Remember to include Strub's Pickles as part of your celebrations and family get-togethers this festive season.

Letter of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy,

Can Dill Pickles and Tomatoes be eaten straight from the jar, or should they be rinsed in cold water first? I insist they should be rinsed, but my daughter refuses to do so. Who's right and who's wrong? —Sincerely, R.G., Thornhill, ON (with a similar letter from D.P., Ormeaux, QUE)

The Pickle Guy Replies

This is not such an unusual question. The brine of the full-sour pickles and tomatoes is actually a little stronger than the pickle itself. Those who like to get the complete pickle experience always eat their pickles straight-from-the-jar. Many other people are a little more sensitive to the brine, and decide to rinse the pickles quickly under cold water before they are served. I usually recommend rinsing when serving to very young children for this very reason.

But, to answer your question, I am pleased to say that YOU ARE BOTH RIGHT! In other words, you can have your Strub's and eat them too. I will be sending a Pickle Guy hat and T-shirt to both R.G. and D.P. for their insightful letters.

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

The Canadian Jewish Book of Remembrance
A Progress Report

Three years ago, a group of veterans, led by Oscar Adler, decided to form the Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association.

Since that time, they incorporated the association, developed promotional material and began soliciting support.

Their main objective is to publish a CANADIAN JEWISH BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE. It is estimated that it will cost approximately $70,000.00 to publish the book for the Canadian Jewish community. $18,000.00 of this has already been raised.

The major problem will be to gather the names of all the Canadian Jewish War Veterans who served in the Canadian Armed Forces during the 20th Century. We already have names from the Royal Canadian Legion Jewish Branches, the Jewish War Veterans Association of Canada and various B'nai Brith Lodges, as well as veterans and their families.

We ask for support from the Jewish community or any other organization that can help us gather the names of these veterans.

The Association has two goals. The first is to complete their project and the second is to make this Canadian Jewish Book of Remembrance as complete as possible. It will take a lot of support from the Canadian Jewish community to achieve these goals.

The Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association asks anyone in Canada who is related to, or knows the name of any Jewish Canadian who:

- LOST THEIR LIVES WHILE SERVING IN THE CANADIAN ARMED FORCES OR
- ANY JEWISH CANADIAN WHO SERVED IN THE CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

to send their names, regimental numbers and units to Oscar Adler, President, Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association, 640 Sheppard Ave. E., Ste. 602, Toronto, Ont. M2K 1B8, or telephone 416-225-4276. Tax receipts will be issued for any donation of $18.00 or more.

Aussie-Israel relations suffer 'rupture': Cotler

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irwin Cotler remembers the last Maccabiah Games well. Invited to join the Canadian delegation, Cotler was close by when the footbridge over the Yarkon River collapsed during the Games' opening ceremonies.

Four Australians who plunged into the toxically polluted Yarkon River were killed, and about 70 others were injured.

More than a year later, the wounds from that tragic event have not yet healed. On the contrary. In Australia, youth athlete Sasha Elterman, who has undergone 26 surgical procedures, has again been hospitalized due to the fungal meningitis she contracted after falling into the Yarkon.

And for the loyally Zionistic Jewish community, relations with Israel have cooled considerably. In fact, said Cotler, "what was an inspirational component of the Israel-Diaspora relations has turned into a rupture of Israel-Diaspora relations."

Cotler, a law professor at McGill University and a human rights activist, visited Australia recently.

Cotler said he found "the close knit Australian community, with its almost mythic view of Israel, has been disappointed. Their pain is due to a tragedy that was caused by criminal negligence, and they feel that since then, Israel and has been dragging its feet" in getting to the bottom of it.

The question of responsibility for the collapse is "not a matter limited to the families of the victims. I saw it as pervasive. It's an important issue in Australia-Israel relations.

"There was a palpable anger to Israel among some of the people in the audience" at a UJA event, not just towards the Maccabi World Union (MWU), which organized the games, he noted.

In the aftermath of the collapse, criminal charges were laid against five individuals, including the bridge's engineers and contractors, and the former chair of the Maccabiah organizing committee, Yoram Eyal.

After intense lobbying from Australia, the Knesset set up an independent committee to study the bridge collapse. The criminal trials and the committee's deliberations are ongoing.

For Australian Jews, the bridge collapse is especially painful because it was preventable, Cotler said. Australians he met asked, "How could this negligence have been allowed to occur?" They also asked, "Why is it taking so long for justice to be done and why are there no MWU resignations?"

In Australia, Colin Elterman, Sasha's father, has been one of the most outspoken critics of the MWU. Responding via e-mail to written questions from The CJN, Elterman stated he believes the Australian and Canadian Maccabi organizations should "not attend the next Maccabiah unless issues concerning MWU are properly resolved."

He called on MWU president Ronaldo Bakalarz and chair Uzi Netanel to resign. He also called on Maccabi Canada to pressure MWU officials to resign and to try "to ensure that the Pan-American Games to be held in Mexico next year will be MWU-free."

Elterman's lawyer, Derrick Zabow, said the victims are seeking the support of North American and Israeli delegates to the General Assembly, hosted by UJA Federations of North America, when they meet in Israel this week. He's asking the delegates to call upon local Maccabi movements "to press for a thorough overhaul of the MWU" as well as to "galvanize Diaspora support for the Australian Jewish community, who have been sorely unsupported by world Jewry."

Meanwhile, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and the Zionist Federation of Australia have entered the fray. They recently asked the Olympic Committee of Israel (OCI), which is planning to send a delegation to Sydney to prepare for the 2000 Olympics, to "not include in any of its delegations to Australia members who are associated with the MWU leadership."

Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon, who participated in a MWU reconciliation effort in Australia last February, said, "We're aware of the feelings in Australia."

But he said they are a result of misplaced anger brought on by "misinformation." Contrary to the perception in Australia, the MWU has always been intensely concerned over their loss, Salomon said.

"I understand the emotions of the people in Australia. This was a major tragedy... There are inquiries being held and I think judgment should be reserved until the facts are finally out," Salomon said.

"We've sent thousands upon thousands of kids to Israel. We've been involved in the Pan Am Maccabi Games, involved in the Youth Games. There have been so many wonderful experiences without incident, injuries or death. This was a tragedy and we're trying to get to the bottom of what happened.

"Nobody's interested in hiding anything. It's just a matter of letting the facts come out."

The Week in Israel

• Ehud Olmert of the Likud was re-elected mayor of Jerusalem for a second term. Religious parties won nearly half of the seats on the council.

• Israeli planes attacked suspected Hezbollah targets in south Lebanon for a third consecutive day.

Nov. 12

Russian legislator's anti-Semitism fuels debate

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — As the controversy over anti-Semitism within the Russian Communist party continues to fester, some newspapers are accusing Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov of supporting the Communists' ultra-nationalism.

Liberal politicians have been clamoring for the party to be banned after its leaders refused to officially censure Communist lawmaker Gen. Albert Makashov for anti-Semitic remarks he made at mass demonstrations last month.

Critics allege that the party's failure to censure Makashov publicly – the leader of the party, Gennady Zyuganov, said he was "reprimanded" – reflects the party leadership's private endorsement of Makashov's publicly stated sentiments.

But Primakov, who has kept silence on the matter until last week, said that he opposed banning the Communist Party.

Primakov added that one has to "be careful with such statements," apparently referring to comments by business tycoon Boris Berezovsky, former prime minister Yegor Gaidar and ex-Deputy Premier Anatoly Chubais, who called for outlawing the Communists.

While most legal experts argue that it would be either technically very difficult or "unproductive" to outlaw the Communist party, two leading daily newspapers criticized Primakov's stand, saying that in fact he was endorsing the party leadership in its attempts to defend Makashov.

The leading business newspaper, Kommersant Daily, said this week that Primakov's reaction suggests that the "Duma and the government are moving in the same direction – not only on economics but also on the ethnic question." The paper described Primakov's reaction as "dishonorable."

Some analysts speculate that Primakov's stand was due to his desire to win broad support for next year's budget, which is expected to arrive soon in the Duma, the Communist-dominated lower house of Parliament.

Meanwhile, the head of the Russian Orthodox Church also criticized Makashov. Patriarch Alexy II said, "Any attempts to foment [interracial] hatred destabilizes the already precarious accord in society."

In a related development, Russia's prosecutor general Yuri Skuratov announced this week that his agency had found evidence which demonstrates that Makashov's statements incited ethnic strife. He did not clarify, however, whether his office would ask the Duma to strip Makashov of parliamentary immunity.

An unrepentant Makashov continues to make anti-Semitic statements.

This week he appeared on a television talk show and said Jews are "bloodsuckers," and in an interview with an Italian newspaper he said Jewish participation in government, business and mass media should be subject to a special quota corresponding to its proportion of the population.

Teen charged with stabbing soldier

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — Czech police have charged a teenage skinhead with stabbing a Jewish soldier.

The 17-year-old suspect was charged under the country's hate crimes laws with attempting racially motivated murder and promoting fascism. Since the accused was a minor at the time of the alleged crime, he faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison.

The executive secretary of the Federation of Czech Jewish Communities said he believed the attack was the first anti-Semitic criminal act since the fall of communism in 1989.

"It's a very alarming incident," said Tomas Kraus.

The Czech press reported that the youth stabbed the 22-year-old soldier at a Prague restaurant in the early hours of Nov. 8. The soldier was reported to be in stable condition in a Prague hospital.

"There are two victims," said Kraus. "This young Jewish man – and the one who attacked him. He is a victim of a certain ideology, and to be in prison for 10 years will ruin his life."

Kraus said the incident could be a result of the failure of the Czech justice system to punish crimes against Romanies (Gypsies).

Filmmaker goes in search of Israel's 10 lost tribes

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Throughout history, there has been a great deal of speculation about the fate of the lost tribes of Israel, one of the great mysteries of Western civilization.

Seven years ago, Simcha Jacobovici, the two-time Emmy award-winning filmmaker, embarked on a quest for the lost tribes.

The 10 tribes had been exiled from the kingdom of Israel, and dispersed by their Assyrians conquerors in the eighth century BCE.

Drawing on two years of investigation by four full-time researchers, Jacobovici headed to Asia with a film crew in the spring of 1997 to solve the 2,700-year old mystery.

"Nobody thought we would find the lost tribes. But people thought the quest would be a real-life-Indiana Jones story so they were willing to fund the project."

Unfolding in remote places like Afghanistan, India and Pakistan, Jacobovici's adventures are documented in his latest film, Quest for the Lost Tribes, which will premiere at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre at 255 Front St. W., Nov. 22, at 7 p.m.

The film is being presented by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre (RJCC).

Proceeds from the screening will fund medical equipment for a new facility for women and infants at the Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem as well as support the RJCC.

Jacobovici said that after the death of King Solomon, the Jewish state split in two – the northern kingdom of Israel which was made up of the tribes of Reuven, Simeon, Issachar, Zevelun, Menashe, Ephraim, Dan, Naphtali, Gad and Asher, and the southern kingdom of Judea where the tribes of Benjamin, Judah and Levy were situated. Most Jews today claim descent from the Judean or southern tribes, he noted.

"What happened to the other 10 tribes? This is a question that is fundamental to Christians and Jews," Jacobovici said recently.

The return of the lost tribes is bound up with events in both religious traditions, he noted. "According to Christian doctrine, there is no second coming of Jesus until all the lost tribes are found. General Jewish belief is that the return of the tribes will herald the Messianic times."

The Bible was an important source for his quest, Jacobovici said. "We looked at the Bible, and used it as a treasure map, looking for tribes where the Bible pointed us to.

"We didn't expect to find them in caves. We hoped that we would find people with an Israelite memory...with Israelite customs, and maybe even people desiring to return to Israel and Judaism because that's what the prophecy says will happen at the end of days.

"So, in a sense, the film is a documentary documenting the apocalypse. If we're right, then we've actually captured on film the tribes of Israel returning to their 2700 year old roots. If we're right, we've captured on film prophecy unfolding."

He said the film takes "the audience on a journey to some of the most exotic and dangerous places on earth – India, Afghanistan, Uzbekistan...Each place has a different story. Any stereotype of Jews will be blown to pieces."

Jacobovici's interest in the lost tribes stem from his involvement with Ethiopian Jewry during the early '80s, and his curiosity about Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail's work with the B'nai Menashe of India, he said.

"When the chief rabbi of Israel ruled that the Ethiopian Jews are from the Israelite tribe of Dan, and if Rabbi Avichail is right that he's found the tribe of Menashe, I thought, is it possible that two of the 10 tribes have started a process of return?"

He was thus inspired to search for the other tribes, a pursuit that was grounded in historical research and sound archaeological and anthropological evidence, he said.

"It's going to be very controversial," he said. "Most historians claim the tribes assimilated 2700 years ago, and here we are saying not only did they not assimilate, but there's a whole hidden history of the Jewish people that we have not even begun to scratch the surface of."

To order tickets, call 781-3584. Tickets are $36 for the general admission which includes a pre-screening reception at 6:30 p.m. The $180 patron ticket includes tax receipt and post-film gala.

Choir keeps flame alive

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir was formed more than 70 years ago, when Toronto's Jewish community was concentrated around Spadina's garment district.

Still going strong, it is the subject of Allan Collins' sentimental documentary, Keeping the Flame Alive: The Story of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, to be aired by Vision TV on Nov. 24 at 10 p.m.

The 32-minute film, buttressed by archival file footage of the Spadina district and of Jewish factory workers at work and on strike, focuses on a concert performance by the choir of Fantasy on a Jewish Theme, composed and conducted by Milton Barnes.

From its inception in 1925, the choir was closely attuned to the temper of the times, confining its repertoire to songs which distilled the struggles for a better life and a better society in the face of persecution and exploitation.

Thanks to one of its conductors, an Austrian refugee from Nazism named Emil Gartner, who was killed in an automobile accident almost 40 years ago, the choir became an institution in the city.

At the height of the Cold War, Paul Robeson, the great African-American soloist, accompanied the choir at Massey Hall. What a moment it must have been.

Keeping the Flame Alive, which unfolds to the infectious rhythms of The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, draws on the reminiscences of, among others, Barnes and Bella Shek, an immigrant from Eastern Europe who joined the choir just two weeks after her arrival in Canada.

In passing, David Buchbinder, a band member, expounds on the nature of klezmer music.

Keeping the Flame Alive is a modest but enlightening confection.

Store runs out of new Torgov novel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In preparation for the launch of Morley Torgov's novel The War to End All Wars, staff at Chapters Books on Bloor Street West set a pile of more than 200 books near the table where Torgov would be signing copies.

Shortly after the party got under way, that section of the store became filled with the Toronto lawyer-author's fans, who scooped up all available copies of the book, and then stood in line for him to autograph them.

Many also took the time to shmooze by the wine bar or the hors d'oeuvres tables.

As befitting such a high-profile literary event – Torgov is an accomplished novelist and winner of the Leacock Medal for humor – numerous celebrities were present. They included his publishers Malcolm Lester and Barbara Koven, his literary agent Beverley Slopen, author-critics Robert Fulford and Martin Knelman, children's entertainer Bram Morrison (of Sharon, Lois and Bram), lawyer-politico Lionel Schipper, actor-director Al Waxman, literary agent Bella Pomer and author Joe Kertes, who is also a Leacock winner.

Torgov stopped to say a few words. He began writing the book in 1981 but left it, he said, to write two other novels. When he returned to the unfinished manuscript, "I grew to develop a healthy contempt for it," he joked.

Torgov thanked Slopen "whom I refer to as my literary dominatrix. The abuse I took from her you would not believe. But somehow she has cajoled me into writing five books and I want to thank her for that."

He also praised Lester, "whose faith in my writing is an example of faith beyond anything religious that I have ever seen."

Then the author of such titles as A Good Place To Come From and The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick returned to the book-signing table.

In the end, the store ran out of copies of The War to End All Wars before all the readers who wished to purchase the book were satisfied.

A compelling story of a battle between two competing Jewish merchants in a small town in Michigan in the 1920s, The War to End All Wars is published by Malcolm Lester Books and sells for $26.95.

Israel visit moves entertainer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Sharon Hampson is not religious, she found her first visit to Israel a powerful experience.

The popular children's entertainer – best known for the past 20 years as part of the award-winning trio Sharon, Lois & Bram – spent three weeks in Israel recently with her husband, Joe, also a musician.

Being in such a strongly Jewish environment was "probably the most profound thing," she said. She was raised as a secular Jew, but feels her Jewish heritage very strongly, she said. Her husband is not Jewish, although she suspects he sometimes forgets that, she added.

Among her most affecting experiences was a visit to the Western Wall, where she inserted notes on behalf of people who were ill. A few years ago, she was the beneficiary of such a note, following a bout with breast cancer.

Sitting on a comfy couch in an open area just off her kitchen, Hampson discussed her trip and shared thoughts on travelling and life, interrupting the interview briefly to check on beets she was cooking for a salad. Still tanned from the Middle East sun, she wore no makeup. "I spend so many hours in makeup. For me, the best part is washing my face."

For Hampson, connecting with local people makes a trip memorable. "If you don't make a human connection, the experience lacks something," she said.

The Hampsons rented a car for a do-it-yourself tour that included Bethlehem, Haifa, the Dead Sea, a stay in a kibbutz guest house and swimming with dolphins in Eilat. Their itinerary also included a stop in Petra, Jordan.

Through the Hampson's travel agent, who put Sharon in touch with Israeli consul Irit Waidergorn, the couple met Israeli children's entertainer Chani Nachemias at the Tel Aviv studio where Nachemias films her television show. She also appears on brief spots to address issues like abuse and different ways of observing Jewish holidays.

In conversation, the Hampsons learned that Nachemias has a staff psychologist to frame appropriate answers for children's questions. "They get tons of letters," said Sharon.

Sharon, Lois & Bram's Elephant Show and Skinnamarink TV, the trio's new show based on wacky goings-on at a fictional television station, are not seen on Israeli television.

Hampson didn't fear for her safety in Israel, but she found it "a huge adjustment" to see Israeli soldiers with guns at every turn. "More poignant," she added, "was the youth of the soldiers and the size of the guns." One young female soldier, sucking a lollipop, epitomized the contrast for her.

Jeff Burns

Record company exec promotes Canadian artists

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

MARKHAM — Jeff Burns, president of Shoreline Records Inc. has marketed some of Canada's most innovative recording artists.

Burns, 47, originally a guitar player for the local band, J.B. and the Casuals, started in the music business as a record store clerk, right out of high school. When the store was bought by A & A, a division of CBS Records, Burns rose to head of promotion.

By 1968, Burns had become Ontario promotions manager for MCA Records Canada, and in 1970 he was hired as vice-president of GRT Records, a Canadian company whose artists included Ian Thomas, Lighthouse, Moe Koffman, Prism and Dan Hill.

A decade later Burns moved to CBS Records, now Sony, as a vice-president. In this position, he oversaw all recording projects and secured releases for the domestic roster.

Burns left Sony in 1989, and after starting his own record company, Justin Entertainment, became partners with Tim Towle in Shoreline Records, named in honor of Burns' passion for power boating.

"The Canadian music scene is very tough. In order to compete you have to have the support staff, a good distributor and of course, the right product," Burns says.

Two exclusive deals

Shoreline recently signed two exclusive Canadian distribution deals, one with Sony, the other with Koch, an American company with 16 affiliates worldwide.

On the international scene, Burns is free to negotiate deals with other record distributors on behalf of his artists, and plans to do this in January '99 at MIDEM, the music festival, held in Cannes.

"Shoreline is one of only a handful of Canadian independent record companies that offer in-house consulting, marketing, publishing and national distribution," he says. "An artist with an independent, will get more attention than with a multinational.

Shoreline has signed an eclectic array of acts including model turned pop diva Nico Matisse; urban dance artist Sugar J. Phillips; former Sony recording band Hemingway Corners; Long Tom and the Dusty Danglers; and Vibrolux, whose CD tracks have been featured on the television shows La Femme Nikita, Due South, Once A Thief and Ooh La La.

Country is well represented by new talent Danny Alex and Canadian country music award winner, Patricia Conroy. Shoreline's most successful signing to date is acappella favorite, The Nylons. Their CD, Fabric of Life has sold over 30,000 copies.

Burns sees his future roster growing slowly, but surely. "I am comfortable with the responsibility of evaluating the potential of an established act or going with my gut feeling when signing a new artist. Since leaving Sony, I have become self-motivated. I prefer to be on my own, and not be entangled in piles of paperwork and politics."

Israel visit moves Sharon Hampson

Their only hesitation about going to Israel was due to the decline of the Canadian dollar, Hampson said. But since her experience with breast cancer, she's realized that "you have to seize the moment."

A call to a New Israel Fund representative, whose name had been given to them, resulted in an invitation to see some of the fund's beneficiaries.

When Hampson said her main interests were women's health and children's issues, she and her husband were taken to a women's health organization in Jerusalem that, coincidentally, was dealing with breast cancer issues – informing and empowering women – similar to those being dealt with by Willow, the breast cancer resource centre Hampson was involved in establishing here. "We had a fantastic conversation," she reports.

In Jerusalem's Old City, Hampson was struck by the combined presence of Jews and Arabs. "I thought, 'Oh boy, if these guys could only get it right, anything would be possible in the world.' They're in the market side by side, across from each other, and they're somehow managing, so it makes you feel like there's some potential."

Proper care the key to healthy feet for school kids

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With the school year well under way, parents should keep a close eye on the well-being of their children's feet, a prominent podiatrist says.

Once settled into daily classes and activities, kids may develop poor foot hygiene habits and use improper footwear, Neil Naftolin says. And because young feet can adapt to unhealthy conditions, a lack of care over time can have long-term consequences and heighten hereditary foot problems.

Naftolin, a past president of the Ontario Podiatry Association, says the best advice for children's foot care is the same as for good dental and optical health: proper maintenance and routine checkups.

"If your children do not complain about their teeth, you would still bring them to the dentist for a regular checkup to prevent deterioration and reinforce beneficial dental habits. [It's] the same principle for healthy feet," he says.

"A number of foot afflictions that adults suffer start in childhood but can be readily prevented, yet most parents do not look into their children's foot care until a problem occurs," Naftolin says. "Even then, they may think the pain is normal, and not seek the proper attention to treat it."

While seeing a podiatrist is useful, Naftolin says children can also learn healthy habits to reduce common problems.

He says athlete's foot can be minimized by keeping feet dry. He recommends toweling off excess moisture between toes and under feet when washing after gym or other physical activities. Applying an anti-fungal foot powder may also help.

For children who perspire profusely, use cotton blend socks rather than synthetics.

Having a change of shoes at school is another good idea. Using one pair for gym activities and another for walking will promote better foot hygiene. Leather shoes are also suggested for children with excessive perspiration, foot odor or recurring athlete's foot.

When choosing children's footwear, Naftolin says parents should look for quality and avoid inexpensive sneakers or loafers with little or no support.

Running shoes are the best for everyday use. He says both high and low cut shoes provide similar support, although high cuts provide more ankle stability.

Naftolin adds that as children grow, they may need new shoes as often as every three to six months. He says shoes should not be worn beyond that time.

"Kids often wear their running shoes like an old pair of blue jeans. Over time, the shoes lose the level of support and shock absorption they are supposed to provide," he says.

For winter, parents should pick firm boots that have good arch support and a firm heel counter (the part of the shoe that surrounds the heel).

Naftolin says children and their parents should take an active role in monitoring foot development and become aware of what symptoms could mean.

For instance, children are more susceptible to viral warts during the warmer months of the school year. Warts on the sole of the foot may look like thick skin and are often mistaken for callouses, which are uncommon in children. If neglected, warts can be painful and spread.

Naftolin says complaints of tired feet or sore legs during periods of increased activity are frequently signs of foot problems, which can often be controlled with proper shoes and prescribed custom insoles.

Active children between ages eight and 13 may develop calcaneal apophysitis, a chronic pain caused by inflammation of the growth plate at the back of the heel bone. The condition can often be treated with proper shoes and orthotic devices.

Other problems like ingrown toenails may result from improper cutting or hereditary development. Naftolin says parents should monitor how children cut their nails to ensure they don't rip them or cut them too short. A common treatment – simple in-office laser surgery – is used only if the problem recurs.

Bar-Ilan U focuses on the mechanisms of diabetes

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The focus of diabetes research at Bar-Ilan University in Israel is on why some human cells become insulin resistant, according to two diabetes researchers working at the university.

The hope is that the research will lead to better treatment of the disease, they said at a recent meeting of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"We're focusing on the mechanism of the disease, why it develops in the first place," said Dr. Efrat Wertheimer, who is from is from the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University, but is currently working with Prof. Sandford R. Sampson of Bar-Ilan's Faculty of Life Sciences.

"Insulin is a treatment, but it doesn't tell us why the disease develops," said Wertheimer said.

In particular, the Bar-Ilan research is bearing down on what effect insulin has on skin, which is a factor in so many complications of the disease, Sampson said.

"The skin is directly affected by insulin. We're working on the hypothesis that insulin has a role in other tissues. In short, we're looking for a new approach to diabetes," he said.

The importance of treating diabetes was underscored by Wertheimer, who said a 10-year study of 1,500 patients with early diabetes showed that complications to eyes, feet and other organs was reduced 50 to 75 percent when the level of glucose was kept down.

In a question and answer session, Wertheimer said the newest treatment for diabetes lowers insulin resistance but the mechanism is not understood.

There is no new specific treatment for wound healing, she said. The "pins and needles" pain felt by some patients in their feet is the result of a reaction to abnormal blood supply caused by the disease.

Complications are the same from both early and late onset diabetes, she said. Doctors try to avoid giving insulin in the the case of late onset diabetes, relying instead on pills and diet.

In other business, Les Scheininger, president of Canadian Friends, said a major expansion of the Bar-Ilan property at Ramat Gan to 150 acres is underway.

Zionism re-visited: Consensus no longer exists

By MARTIN KROSSEL
Special to The CJN

Opinion

A little over 20 years ago, I was part of a group that put out a Zionist newspaper, Israel Weekly Perspective, for students on Toronto's university campuses. Most of the paper consisted of articles about Israel from other sources, such as the New York Times, that we thought most of our readers would not get a chance to see.

My contribution was to write an editorial for each issue presenting "Israel's side" on stories that had been in the news that week. The need to present "Israel's case" arose out of our perception that Israel was unduly embattled on the world stage, and that it was not being treated fairly by the mainstream press.

Those were not happy days for the Jewish state. It had just gone through the trauma of the Yom Kippur War. At the United Nations, Israel was regularly being censured for various actions and policies, and the resolution equating Zionism with racism had just been passed in the General Assembly.

We felt that news accounts were typically slanted against Israel. Columnists and editorial writers were unfairly blaming Israel for prolonging its conflict with the Arabs and Palestinians, by jealously holding on to territories captured in the 1967 war and thus denying the Palestinians the right to establish a state of their own.

For our part, we argued that, in the absence of a demonstrated Arab willingness to make peace with Israel, the Jewish state could potentially be committing national suicide by surrendering the territories.

We also steadfastly opposed the granting of any diplomatic status to the PLO, since we thought this would legitimate its war of terror against Israelis and Jews around the world. We never doubted the justice of our case. This confidence was based largely on how Israel's history had been passed down to us by our parents. We also knew that the stands we took in the 1970s reflected the positions of an almost universal consensus among Jews in Israel as well as the Diaspora.

The consensus no longer exists.

Adi Ophir, of Tel Aviv University's Institute of Philosophy of Science and Ideas, recently asserted that, collectively, our parents lied to us. He said he no longer believes that Israel is a force for good in the world. He was speaking at a conference on Reflections on Zionism's Successes, Failures and Prospects at 100, held at New York City's New School for Social Research. Along with the New School, the other conference sponsors were the YIVO Institute of Jewish Research and the Dorot Foundation.

The session at which Ophir spoke, entitled Post-Zionism?, was clearly the one where the most sparks flew. On the surface, the basic tenet "post-Zionism" seems harmless. It is premised on the notion that Israel has already achieved the objectives of its intellectual founders, and is now in search of new agendas.

But post-Zionism's undercurrent is much more ominous. Zionism's success allows intellectuals, for the first time, to examine Zionism's past. Such examination reveals that the movement's pioneers were not the heroic figures they are often made out to be. They made mistakes, and some of their decisions were highly questionable from a moral standpoint.

Most of these revisionists shift the primary blame for the Middle East conflict from the Arabs to the Zionists. For instance, Avishal Margalit of the Hebrew University's Department of Philosophy claimed at a session on Zionism and the Arab World that the Arab-Israeli conflict itself might have been avoided had the Jews built cities, and not tried to reclaim agricultural land, thereby dispossessing the indigenous Arab population.

Easier to vilify Israel's leaders

Post-Zionism's claim of objectivity is disingenuous; it is history tied to a contemporary political platform. If the old Zionists could be seen as oppressors rather than victims, it becomes easier to vilify today's Israel leaders. Arabs can be absolved from any responsibility for reconciliation between Palestinians and Israelis. Thus, Margalit maintained, the increase of Arab terrorism after Olso was solely a reaction to Baruch Goldstein's 1994 massacre of civilians in a Hebron mosque.

Significantly, Margalit never addressed the question of whether a violent response was justified. Nor did he comment on whether it was legitimate to hold all Israelis responsible for Goldstein's crime, even though it was widely, although admittedly not unanimously, condemned across Israel's political and religious spectrum.

The extent to which Israel's current leadership was demonized was perhaps best demonstrated in an almost off-hand remark by Margalit. He charged that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had signed the Wye Mills accords only to secure his own re-election. Once he secures a new term in office, Margalit predicted that Netanyahu will kill the peace process in the final status negotiations.

On the other hand, Margalit accused the Israelis of demanding the impossible from the Palestinians. One could not expect Yasser Arafat to control terrorism, while denying him the opportunity to establish an independent state, Margalit said. The Palestinian masses could not be expected to accept a bargain that was so one-sided.

The conference was marked disturbingly by an almost total lack of balance. No speakers vigorously celebrated Zionism's achievements. Only Leon Wieseltier, literary editor of the New Republic, was willing to declare the Zionist project to be on the whole just, despite moral lapses of some of its leaders.

In a well-rounded concluding lecture, Shlomo Avineri of Hebrew University's Department of Political Science noted that the gap between aspiration and accomplishment has existed in every democratic society, and that gap is just as small in Israel as in other places. Yet even Avineri talked about undoing some of the outcomes of the Six Day War, namely that Israeli history embodied cosmic messianism.

But Wieseltier and Avineri were the only contributors who had anything good to say about Zionism. The inclusion in the program of intellectuals and writers who view Zionism and Israel with more sympathy would have made the conference's presentation of Zionist and Israeli history much more complete.

The University of Toronto's Derek Penslar, in chairing the panel on post-Zionism, asked its members to differentiate between post-Zionism and the old anti-Zionism preached by those who wanted to destroy the Jewish state. The panelists largely evaded this question.

Ophir did claim that post-Zionism is merely a label placed on the theories of scholars who examine Zionism critically in order to delegitimize their criticism of the movement. Yet Ophir himself called Israel an apartheid society. Just 20 years ago, that kind rhetoric was used only by Israel's fiercest enemies. At this conference, attended by many who teach Jewish studies, it produced not one word of protest.

Ophir said he wanted to end the monopoly in Israel of those who would not tolerate any criticism of Zionism. But no such monopoly exists.

Zionism's critics have jobs in Israel's universities and are well entrenched in the country's intellectual circles. That means that future generations of Jews in both Israel and the Diaspora will be taught and influenced by many people who believe Zionism's impact to have been morally questionable. That sobering prospect should frighten those of us who care about Israel's future.

New book a valuable resource for hockey aficionados

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the beginning, the powers that be created the National Hockey Association (NHA). And the NHA was tumultuous and without consensus, so the powers that be caused a great wind to stir that blew the 8-year-old league beyond the face of the deep. And the owners saw that it was not good that the people should live without their winter sport, so they created the National Hockey League. And they saw that it was good...

If hockey wasn't a religion in this country, then it wouldn't have needed its very own bible. Though not something to bow down to, and far from divine in inspiration, Total Hockey (Dan Diamond and Associates, published by Total Sports, $64.95) is a veritable hockey bible and Britannica rolled into one, a valuable resource for anyone who takes the game of hockey seriously.

At 1,878 pages, it contains stories, stats, opinions, analysis and trivia, lots of trivia, that should keep hockey aficionados busy for years.

A coffee-table book that the beer-chugging, game-watching set will love, Total Hockey will also appeal to the more cerebral followers of Canada's national pastime. It's fun, but it doesn't shy away from addressing controversial issues plaguing hockey, like fighting and labor disputes.

Hockey maven Dan Diamond

It also introduces some thought-provoking new features. Treading where only radio call-in shows and specialty magazines have gone before, the book attempts to answer the age-old question, who's better, Howe or Gretzky? Who had a better year, Gordie Howe in 1952-53 when he scored a career-high 49 goals, or Wayne Gretzky, who bulged the twine 92 times in 1981-82?

Unanswerable by mere mortals, you may say. Nevertheless, the book's hockey mavens have advanced an objective approach in a bid to solve that conundrum. Called "adjusted scoring," it's an attempt to evaluate players' accomplishments in different eras to determine how they would have done had they all played in one 82-game season.

It takes into account a host of factors, including the goals per game scored in the league each season, and it gives extra weight to goals scored in a tight, defensive campaign. Diamond concludes that Howe's "adjusted goal" total would be 78 in an 82-game season, Gretzky's 74. Yikes! The Great One is not as great!

Taking that analysis farther, managing editor Eric Zweig compares a host of star players spanning more than 70 years of NHL history. Mario Lemieux faces off against Jean Beliveau, statistically speaking, while Bobby Orr, Cyclone Taylor and Paul Coffey butt heads. Other matchups include Steve Yzerman and Max Bentley, Raymond Bourque and Dit Clapper, Bobby Hull and Howie Morenz. It makes for some interesting reading.

Diamond, 44, said he has wanted to create a true hockey encyclopedia since the early 1980s when he established Dan Diamond and Associates (DDA), and won the contract to update and modernize the NHL's annual Official Guide & Record Book. Seventy-two writers from eight countries contributed to Total Hockey, including Diamond, Zweig and Igor Kuperman, a former Moscow journalist, now in the hockey operations department of the Phoenix Coyotes.

Fifty thousand copies were published last month, and a second print run of 10,000 copies has already been ordered, Diamond said.

Other DDA publications include the Annotated Rules of Hockey; Full Spectrum, a History of the Philadelphia Flyers; Forever Rivals, Leafs vs. Canadiens; and the Official NHL 75th Anniversary Commemorative Book.

Diamond, a native of Winnipeg, has always been interested in writing and publishing. In high school, he served as editor of his high school yearbook. Later, he published Eye on Winnipeg and Winnipeg Magazine.

As a youngster, he'd always followed the game of hockey, even though Winnipeg didn't have a professional franchise. At the time, the national team under Father David Bauer was headquartered in Winnipeg, which exposed hockey fans there to high level international competition, he recalled.

He developed tremendous respect for European hockey, which was reinforced when the World Hockey Association's Jets built its mid-1970s team around Bobby Hull and Scandanavian imports like Anders Hedberg, Ulf Nilsson and Kent Nilsson.

In 1980, he moved to Toronto where he got a job with Key Publishing. Working in the circulation department, he was approached by a supervisor and asked if he could help the NHL get rid of its unsold guidebooks, which at the time were bulky, expensive and a money-loser.

Familiar with the book and seeing an opportunity, Diamond readily agreed. He drew up a business plan to completely redesign the hockey guidebook.

The league accepted his proposal, and in the first year, sales figures jumped from 6,000 to 40,000 copies. He's been publishing the guidebook ever since.

Landlords and tenants

By JONATHAN SHIFF

From the time of the British Mandate, the law books in Israel have included a statute called the Law for the Protection of the Tenant. Once common, this arrangement no longer applies except in very specific circumstances, such as where the tenant has made special payments called "key money."

In fact, in many instances, tenants suffer the most due to the law, while at the same time, few property owners would dream of granting someone protected tenancy.

The following are some examples which illustrate the pitfalls of entering into protected tenancy arrangements. All are taken from real cases with which we have dealt:

Residential Tenants' Dilemma: Our client's parents were an elderly couple who lived as protected tenants in downtown Jerusalem. After the husband died, the widow had to make a decision about the apartment. Her choices were stark: She could try and find a buyer for her tenancy, but the amount she would receive – roughly half the value of the apartment, which she would then have to split 66-34 with the landlord – would not provide her with enough funds to live elsewhere.

She could try and sell her rights back to the landlord, but the result would probably be even worse, since he did not have to agree to take the property back at a realistic price. She could have a child or grandchild move in with her and inherit the rights after her death, but all her children and grandchildren had other homes, and so were ineligible under the law.

In the meantime, the place fell to ruin since the elderly woman had no financial incentive to fix it up, and the landlord did not do so either, since he was interested in encouraging her to leave. In the end, the woman lived the rest of her years in a slum, and after she died the landlord got the apartment back for free.

Commercial Tenant's Trap: Alexander and Max owned equal shares in a small company which manufactures transformers for industry. They rented their factory and warehouse in 1949, paying key money to be protected tenants. Over the years, they lost their copy of the lease.

After Max died, his son, Uri, joined the business in his stead.

Today, Alexander is 85 and wants to retire. After almost a year of negotiations, they have agreed on a price, and Alexander is set to retire on January 1. While the lawyers were working out the contract, Uri went to the landlord to pay the rent, and asked for a copy of the lease. To the partners' astonishment, they learned that if one sells out to the other, the remaining partner will lose his rights to the property. Naturally, the property was a significant factor in setting the price, and now the deal has come apart. Alexander is prevented from retiring, and Uri is stuck with a partner he doesn't want.

Landlord Blackmailed: ABC Co. owns a property in what will eventually be a nice neighborhood.

The property consists of a parking lot and a shabby old building, which have been rezoned to permit the erection of offices and hotels as part of the refurbishment of a historic part of town. On the top floor lives a protected tenant who has always paid pennies a month for rent.

By law, the company cannot evict the tenant without finding her an alternative place to live. It has found her several possibilities, all of which are nicer than her current home but which she has rejected as being unsuited to her needs. The last home was rejected because it did not back onto the main street and was therefore "too quiet". Clearly, she is holding out for a large cash payment. The company is taking her to court, with the likely result that a settlement will be found in which she gets an apartment, the lawyers all get paid, the company loses money and the neighbourhood languishes a couple of years longer.

The above stories are merely the tip of the iceberg. While there are good reasons to assist tenants, the law, as it is currently written, creates a distorted set of economic incentives, leading to a situation fraught with litigation and strategizing more than creating a protected pool of rental housing.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am 38, single and a woman. This seems to be an absolutely killer combination where my family is concerned.

I have a rather large family, and therefore there always seems to be a wedding, bar mitzvah or birthday party happening. I hate attending, because all I ever hear is "Marilyn dear you look wonderful, have you met someone yet?" First of all you should know I am 50 pounds overweight and I know when they say I look wonderful I feel like crawling under the table. Second, I can't stand the pitying looks I get from the family, as I am the only one walking in dateless to these affairs.

I am basically happy with my life. Sure I would like to find Mr. Right, but I have many friends and have not found him yet, So...? Why does this have to be a fate worse than death? How can I deal with these insensitive relatives?

Pesky Pity Parties

Dear Pesky Pity Parties,

You have to realize that some of these people don't believe you can possibly be happy without a spouse, because that's the way they were raised and that's the way society has taught them to think.

There are many happily married people and also many married people who are miserable, but hey... they're married, so it doesn't matter! This is an attitude that has been around for many years. Your family did not create it, so try not to blame them.

What you have to do is know in advance what you're stepping into and be prepared. Psych yourself before you go to these affairs and answer their questions if you feel you want to or just change the subject quickly. They'll get the hint.

You can also say politely, "I'd rather not discuss that topic" and move on to something else. Keep in mind, they mean you no harm.

One last thing I'd like to address is the 50 pounds overweight and feeling that you can't accept a compliment issue.

That is obviously a self-esteem problem. Please don't fall into the "thin is in" trap. Don't measure the person you are in pounds. You are an important viable part of our society and you are beautiful at any weight.

Be proud.

Settlers, PA slam Israel

Both sides criticize Wye implementation

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Just days after Israel began to implement the Wye agreement, the Jewish state has drawn fire from West Bank settlers and the Palestinian Authority.

The settlers' complaints came after Israel carried out the first of three further redeployments in the West Bank called for under the accord.

Palestinian officials focused on another Israeli action taken that day – the release of 250 Palestinian prisoners.

Last weekend, settler groups responded to the redeployment by setting up encampments at two West Bank sites.

In one incident, settlers gathered on a hilltop near the settlement of Itamar, saying they wanted to expand the community.

And near the settlement of Sebastia, several dozen people gathered at an abandoned rail station, saying they would establish a museum and yeshiva at the site. The Israeli army responded by sealing off the area around the station.

Meanwhile, settler leaders complained about the inadequacy of the army's defence plans for Jewish settlements affected by the redeployment.

The leaders charged that the plans were outdated and that greater emphasis should be placed on security on roads that link the settlements.

Army officials responded that they were working in full cooperation with the settlements and that plans were being drawn up for each community affected by the redeployments.

In the redeployment, Israel transferred two percent of the West Bank, or some 44 square miles, from sole Israeli control to joint control with the Palestinian Authority. Israel also handed over 7.1 percent of land in the region to sole Palestinian control.

Upbeat end to GA

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
CJN Editor

JERUSALEM — Relationships were the main item on the agenda of the 67th General Assembly of the UJA Federations of North America (GA) that concluded here last week, specifically the myriad, complicated relationships between the Jews of Israel and their co-religionists in North America.

It was the first time the GA was held outside North America.

In honor of Israel's jubilee, the conference was held in Jerusalem. Judging by the upbeat reactions of the conference delegates at the International Convention Centre throughout the four-day gathering, it may not be the last.

Sunny Tavel, a delegate from Ottawa, seemed to capture the mood of the delegates when she told The CJN, "We needed a new connection to Israel and to hearing the story of her people. It was very important to hear it this way."

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Protests To Russia

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has written to Russia's ambassador to Canada, Vitaly Churkin, to protest the recent "shocking" anti-Semitic outburst of a Russian legislator.

Congress says it is unconscionable that Albert Makashov would call for the killing of Jews. Also "dismaying" to CJC is the Russian parliament's failure to censure Makashov.

Grafstein Speaks On Stein

OTTAWA — Senator Jerry Grafstein recently addressed Canada's Senate on the canonization of Edith Stein, a Jewish-born nun murdered at Auschwitz. Stein's elevation to sainthood has caused controversy in Jewish circles.

"It is too early to judge," said Grafstein. "[But] it is not too soon to ask questions."

Kristallnacht Remembered

VANCOUVER — Dr. William Seidelman, a Toronto physician and expert on the role of doctors and medicine during the Third Reich, was the keynote speaker at the community's commemoration of the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

A Vancouver native, Seidelman recounted how doctors readily accepted Nazi doctrines on race and participated in the pre-war euthanasia program of the physically and mentally infirm, and in the forced sterilization of 400,000 Germans.

ISRAEL

Three Soldiers Killed

JERUSALEM — Three Israeli soldiers were killed and four others wounded by a roadside bomb in southern Lebanon last week. The bomb exploded about 100 feet from the soldiers' outpost in the security zone. Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the attack, which it filmed from a distance and broadcast on Lebanese television.

Israel Closes Theatre

JERUSALEM — Israel has closed a Palestinian theatre in eastern Jerusalem to prevent an election of the main wing of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The Oslo accords bar the Palestinians from conducting political activity in eastern Jerusalem.

Ethiopians Protest

JERUSALEM — More than 1,000 Ethiopian immigrants staged a demonstration here last week to demand that Israel accept all those remaining in Ethiopia who wish to settle in Israel. The Israeli government shut down its immigration program in Ethiopia last summer, but several thousand seeking to make aliyah remain behind, many of them in poor health.

Pollard's Request Rejected

JERUSALEM — A petition filed by convicted spy Jonathan Pollard was rejected by an Israeli court last week. Pollard had asked Israel's High Court of Justice to block the release of Palestinian prisoners until he was freed.

Pollard claimed President Bill Clinton promised to release him last month during the negotiations that led to the Wye agreement.

WORLD

Rabbis Attend OU Meet

EAST BRUNSWICK, N.J. — Israel's two chief rabbis, Yisrael Meir Lau and Eliahu Bakshi-Doron; the chief rabbi of Great Britain, Jonathan Sacks; and Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon are expected here this week for the Orthodox Union's (OU) centennial convention. Over 1,000 participants are expected to attend the event, where rabbinic and lay leaders will explore a host of issues affecting American Orthodoxy.

Russia Responds – Sort Of

MOSCOW — Russia is drafting a law to ban political parties that support political extremism, the nation's justice minister announced last week. The move came after the lower house of parliament refused to censure a Communist lawmaker's anti-Semitic remarks. But it remains unclear whether the drafted law will make any specific mention of anti-Semitism.

Frank Publishing Upheld

AMSTERDAM — A Dutch court has ruled in favor of a newspaper that published newly discovered pages of Anne Frank's diary in August. The Swiss-based Anne Frank Fund had charged that Het Parool had committed copyright infringement and should apologize for quoting the newly found pages.

Jewish Targets Attacked

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic was hit with the second act of anti-Semitic violence in less than one week. Earlier this month, headstones in a cemetery in the eastern Czech town of Trutnov were spray-painted with the words "Death to Jews" and with Jewish stars hanging from gallows. Damages were estimated at $8,000. The vandalism came just days after a teen-age skinhead was arrested and charged with stabbing a Czech Jewish soldier in Prague. As of last week, the soldier was in stable condition.

Life Sentences Upheld for Former SS Officers

ROME — Italy's highest appeals court has upheld life sentences imposed on two former Nazis convicted of helping to carry out the worst Nazi atrocity on Italian soil.

The court rejected an appeal to overturn the sentences handed down by a lower appeals court in March against former SS officers Erich Priebke and Karl Hass, both in their mid-80s.

The two were sentenced for their role in the March 1944 massacre of 335 Romans, including about 75 Jews, at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome. The massacres were ordered by the Nazis in retaliation for a partisan attack in Rome the day before that killed 33 German soldiers.

Last Monday's ruling may be the last word on the Priebke affair. Discovered in Argentina in 1994, he was extradited to Italy 18 months later. Priebke was tried twice on charges of involvement in the Ardeatine Caves massacre.

The verdict of the first trial, which freed him, was annulled after protests from relatives of the victims. In the retrial, he was sentenced to several years in prison. He appealed, and last March the appeals court increased the verdict to a life sentence.

Ottawa pays tribute to 50 Holocaust survivors

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The federal government joined forces with a coalition of Jewish groups last Thursday afternoon to pay an unprecedented and moving tribute to 50 Holocaust survivors who have made Canada their home.

The 50 survivors from across Canada, together with their families, were recognized in Parliament's visitor's gallery by the Speaker of the House, and lauded by all parties for their contributions to their adopted homeland.

The group was chosen to represent the thousands of survivors who came to Canada to rebuild their lives, and in so doing, enriched the country with their involvement in the arts, science, politics and every facet of community involvement.

The Jewish coalition, dubbed Zachor (Remember), was composed of B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre, the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Joel Dimitry, the son of survivors and a former chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, welcomed the group to the late afternoon ceremony, held in Parliament's west block, and recognized the attendance of Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, defence minister Art Eggleton, multiculturalism minister Hedy Fry, and Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar.

"Our families are the fortunate few who survived," stated Dimitry, "and in our survival, we vowed to bear witness and never to forget.

"We have survived the worst, but we have given back the best."

Gray brought greetings on behalf of the government, adding that "one feels humble in the presence of survivors of the Shoah.

"The federal government is proud, and the people of Canada are proud to be here with you today... We say to you the honorees and to all survivors: Yasher koach. May you be strengthened and through your lives may you strengthen us all."

There was applause when Gray said war criminals "must be accountable for their crimes. War

Canadians Celebrate

It was early evening and already dark last Wednesday night when the buses left Jerusalem.

Travelling west a handful of kilometres outside the city limits, through the pine-covered hills protecting the ancient/modern capitol, we arrived after a short ride at Mevasseret Zion, a picturesque bedroom community of houses and apartments, with red-tiled roofs built in neatly terraced rows upon the hillsides.

Crisp and cool, the air was our lens toward heaven, magnifying the imprint of the stars upon the cloudless, night sky.

One by one, busload after busload of Canadian delegates to the Jerusalem GA of '98, and other Canadian visitors, were deposited at the doorway of the Red House, a banquet hall restaurant with a white canopy roof.

Greeting us as we alighted the buses were a score of singers and musicians in flashy red and white Maghreb costumes. They formed a gantlet greeting line that we ran through, while on both sides of us drums pounded an incessant beat of urgent anticipation.

Tambourines hissed rhythmic punctuation to the pounding drums, and the women ululated and shrieked songs of impending celebration.

More than 350 Canadians were about to have a party.

The Red House was now converted into a banquet hall, jampacked and crammed with Canadians sitting 10 to a table. There was hardly room to move between the tables, but one had to move to get to the food that was heaped in cornucopious amounts on special stations set up on both sides of the room. There were different ethnic cuisines from which to choose – Moroccan, Yemeni, Israeli and Russian – and a baker's dozen variety of breads. And there were drinks too, soft and hard.

Even though the room was large, we were tightly packed, table abutting table, chair touching chair.

At the front of the room was a stage, and after brief, official greetings, the first entertainment burst onto the stage accompanied by the loud beat of the incessant drum.

The Chai Folk Ensemble from Winnipeg was, that night, completing the third leg of a three-city tour of Israel. The talented Winnipeg teens sang and danced on the stage. Their energy was high, their enthusiasm infectious and their motion, an invitation. The party was on.

We sang along. Many stood where they could, clapping out rhythms, swaying with the beat.

The young performers enticed us with their joy. We felt an almost surrealistic happiness. We were a community of celebrants under the white canopy of the Red House.

When the ensemble finished, we went to the buffet. These Canadians were a happy group.

"What's been your opinion of the GA?" the reporter wanted to know.

"What a wonderful feeling it is to be in our homeland with so many of the people with whom we share our everyday lives," said Susan Jackson of Toronto.

"It was stimulating, a wonderful networking experience. Being here on the 50th anniversary makes it extra, extra special," said Mark Rosen of Halifax.

"It was a very emotional experience," said Beverley Lasky of Hamilton.

"It's been wonderful and really inspiring to be with people who are so committed and so active," added Pearl Grundland of Toronto.

The stations of food were crowded with the milling of hungry, but happy Canadian revelers.

After a while, the food beginning to digest, more entertainment entered on stage: two singers in vaudevillian yellow jackets, tugging on our already overflowing hearts with every famous folk and modern Israeli song in the emotional songbook. They sang. We sang. They sang. We sang and danced.

The happy Canadians formed into circles of dance wherever a space could be found in the crowded room. There was one circle, then two then three. Then the circles joined and became a ribbon of dancing Canadians, reeling in celebration, winding and weaving through the room, around tables and even onto the stage.

"What's been your opinion of the GA?" the reporter asked some of the younger Canadians.

"It was amazing. I got real insight into Israeli society, especially with respect to problems of absorption and integration," said Michael Naiberg of Toronto.

"It was very important that the GA explored issues relevant to both the Diaspora and to Israel. The goals of the conference were very much worth pursuing," said Ami Wise of Dalhousie University.

"It was an amazing GA. I thought it was wonderful. It's much different to dance in Israel than anywhere else," said Jessica Casiro, of Joseph Wolinsky High in Winnipeg.

The party had to end, of course. The musicians, the singers, the technicians, the waiters and the chefs had to go home. And because of that, so did we.

One by one, we returned to the buses, mellow, moved and fatigued by the evening of splendid celebration. What stayed in the reporter's mind on the short journey home was what he was told by the young high school student from Winnipeg: "It's much different to dance in Israel than anywhere else."

Former shaliach resigns from Keren Hayesod post

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Baruch Gur, who served as a popular shaliach in Toronto for two years, has resigned as director general of Keren Hayesod in Jerusalem.

Baruch Gur

Keren Hayesod channels funds raised throughout the Diaspora (except Canada and the U.S.) to the Jewish Agency for Israel, the country's central provider of services for new immigrants.

In federated Canadian Jewish communities, funds raised through UJA campaigns flow to the Jewish Agency through United Israel Appeal.

Gur stepped down effective Nov. 17 following a Nov. 6 newspaper article in the Hebrew daily Yediot Achronot that apparently questioned his lifestyle and personal spending, and alleged he misappropriated Keren Hayesod funds.

Gur resigned 10 days later.

He is not the subject of a police investigation, and police have not indicated they wish to question him, The CJN's Edgar Asher reports.

A statement from UJA Federation of Toronto said the allegations against Gur are being investigated by both the Jewish Agency's comptroller and its legal advisor. The Keren Hayesod board of directors will respond after receiving the investigation findings, UJA added.

Gur served as Keren Hayesod's shaliach in Toronto from 1996 until earlier this year. He was a popular speaker and expert on Jews in the former Soviet Union.

He returned to Israel earlier this year to assume the organization's top job.

As head of the Jewish Agency's East European unit in the late 1980s and early '90s, Gur became a major architect of Operation Exodus, in which over 500,000 Jews from the former Soviet republics immigrated to Israel.

UJA in Toronto praised Gur's "dedication and uncommon commitment to the Jewish people," and commended his decision "to place the interests of Keren Hayesod above his own."

Swiss reject CJC request

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A request by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) for more money for needy Canadian Holocaust survivors from the Swiss humanitarian fund has been turned down.

The rejection came in a letter to CJC from Eli Spanic, director general of the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) in Jerusalem.

There are some 16,000 survivors in Canada, but most are not expected to apply for the funds. CJC officials estimate that the one-time payments to those who do will be only about $250 (US) each from the $2.5 million allotted to Canada from the $185-million Swiss humanitarian fund.

The plea for more money for Canadian survivors was made by Moshe Ronen, CJC president. The WJRO letter ends any hope that the needy survivors will get any more than the amount already allotted.

Spanic did say, however, that if more money becomes available, the issue will be re-evaluated.

The humanitarian fund is separate from the $2.1 billion awarded by Swiss banks to cover property and other restitution claims of families of Holocaust victims. CJC is not involved in the collection and distribution of this money.

CJC expects to distribute the humanitarian funds within the next few months and application forms are being prepared.

Israel to identify survivors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Any Canadians who believe they may have relatives among the 500 Holocaust survivors in Israeli mental hospitals, have been given the right to find out.

The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has won the right to be an intermediary with the Israel Ministry of Health in disclosing the names of survivors in hospital, Moshe Ronen, CJC president, told The CJN in a telephone call from Israel.

"Up to now, Canadian relatives have been stonewalled in their attempts to find out the names of patients," Ronen said.

He said the new agreement was reached after Israeli justice minister Tzahi Hanegbi authorized Shumuel Tzur, administrator general and public trustee of the State of Israel, to meet with him and CJC vice-president Jack Silverstone.

The issue was originally raised by Gustava Weiner of Montreal, who was denied information about hospital patients when she went to Israel for that purpose.

The matter of whether mentally ill survivors have been denied money due to them from German reparations, is now front-page news in Israel, Ronen said.

Tzur has denied any knowledge of patients being told they could not have benefits from the reparations, Ronen said. "He told us he would have allowed them, and that the actions were taken by private trustees for some of the survivors. Apparently, there is a conflict between the private trustees and physicians who care for the patients."

Of the 1,000 patients in Israeli mental hospitals, Tzur told the CJC officials, 500 are incapable of managing their own affairs, and 250 of them have private trustees. About half the total of 1,000 are survivors.

criminals must be brought to justice."

Sigmund Reiser, a Holocaust survivor who was recently appointed a citizenship court judge, invited the survivors and their families to rise and collectively reaffirm their citizenship vows.

At the reception that followed, survivors Jack Rosen of Hamilton and Leah Kaufman of Montreal told of their amazing meeting earlier that day at their hotel.

Kaufman overheard Rosen mentioning the S.S. Sturgis, the ship that had brought both of them to Canada in 1948. Kaufman was sent to Calgary; Rosen to Hamilton, and they had had no further contact until this chance encounter.

Buses then took the honorees and their families to a dinner at Beth Shalom Synagogue, where they were addressed by Eggleton, who said plans for a freestanding Holocaust museum in Ottawa are proceeding.

Former shipmates meet by chance

As Rochelle Wilner, senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, read the names and biographies of the survivors, Fry presented each with a certificate signed by her and Gray.

Fry also praised the many contributions made to this country by Holocaust survivors, saying, "You were not content to be only survivors. You helped to build a nation," and pledged that her department "will not allow such hatred to get a foothold in our country."

Branson to get 98 long-term care beds

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North York General Hospital's Branson Division will get 98 interim long-term care beds starting in January.

As well, within 2½ years, a $10-million project will provide for 151 permanent long-term beds to replace acute care beds.

"Branson will be just as busy, but a far different place," Murray MacKenzie, president of North York General Hospital (NYGH), told a community update meeting, speaking of the ambulatory care centre that Branson will become when it closes as a general hospital.

A total of 68 interim long-term beds will become available in January at Branson, and another 30 in February, Mackenzie said. It is possible that some patients in Mount Sinai Hospital, NYGH or Humber River now awaiting beds, will come to Branson.

The move is an attempt to open up beds for patients who currently occupy general care beds, and to take pressure off emergency hospital services.

The 98 interim long-term care beds at Branson will provide a home-like atmosphere with better dining facilities. The aim is to get patients mobile, said NYGH vice-president Susan Olsen.

Both MacKenzie and Olsen stressed that only patients now awaiting transfer to long-term care are eligible for the 98 beds.

MacKenzie also said that when Branson closes its acute care beds, a $10-million renovation will provide 151 long-term beds at the site of the east tower.

Another high priority is to reopen Branson's current emergency facility to a 24-hour operation, Olsen said. It is now closed at night, but Branson has recruited 10 new emergency care nurses, and as soon as it can recruit another 10, it will open at night.

This project has such a high priority, she said, that Branson is thinking of sending recruiters to Texas to convince Canadian nurses to come back.

The patients still in Branson when it closes as a general hospital will likely follow their physicians to another hospital, MacKenzie said.

Though most are expected to go to the main NYGH site on Leslie, York Central in Richmond Hill or Humber River Regional (formerly York Finch), it is possible that they will go to another hospital with their specialist.

NYGH will provide an additional 32 long-term beds at its seniors health care centre at a cost of $2 million, and eventually build a new $10-million 151-bed long-term centre at a site yet to be determined, possibly near Bloorview.

Olsen said Branson is looking for input from the community on what the new ambulatory care centre should offer. A meeting is to be held in February for this purpose.

The new centre will have expanded day care surgery units (Branson is already doing 80 percent of its surgery in day care) and an expanded outpatient department, including an active eye centre. It will also have increased mental health services and adolescent services. A crisis centre is being considered.

Confirming that Branson will not have an emergency department after the general hospital closes, Olsen said the ambulatory centre will be able to stabilize emergency patients before transferring them to another hospital.

Only a beginning

The recently concluded 67th General Assembly of the UJA Federations of North America (GA) was, by all accounts, a success. It enabled large numbers of North American and Israeli Jews to speak at close range with each other for almost a week.

But it was not a love-in. Even as many of the North American visitors were still unpacking their bags last Tuesday, the following six-column-wide headline greeted them on the front page of the English edition of Ha'aretz: "Israeli UJA chief Dov Lautman tells U.S. Jews: 'Keep your money at home.'"

Lautman had echoed sentiments expressed some years earlier by Yossi Beilin. Then, as now, those views were wrong, based on a fundamental lack of familiarity with the practical and the existential benefits to both recipient and donor of donating those charitable funds.

The headline was, however, ironic. It was eloquent testimony and perfect proof of the need for the massive exchange of views between North Americans and Israelis that was unfolding at the International Convention Centre that very week in Jerusalem.

Like life itself in Jerusalem, fast-paced, frenetic and imbued with an ever-present sense of urgency, so were the deliberations and discussions at this GA. But unlike most previous GA gatherings, the real significance of the first ever Jerusalem GA was not in.the many worthwhile topics that the delegates explored. Rather, it lay in the very fact that so many North Americans, 3,500, chose to come to Israel to try to better understand Israel and Israelis.

That the relationship between the Diaspora and Israel is evolving hardly needs to be pointed out by Lautman or Beilin. Even though its economy has slowed down in the past months, Israel is still an economic powerhouse in the region. Moreover, within a decade, and for the first time in two millennia, Israel will have the largest Jewish population in the world. These demographic shifts alone will dictate new patterns of behavior between the two communities.

As the Ha'aretz editorial of Nov. 18 pointed out, many Jews of the Diaspora "want to focus on the Jewish content of life both in Israel and in North America. They believe that each side has much to contribute to enrich, diversify and deepen the Jewish texture of the other."

Now that the 67th GA has ended, it seems somehow odd that the annual gathering of North America's lay and professional communal volunteers and leaders had never previously been held in Jerusalem. Of course, there have always been compelling reasons for holding the GA in North America, not the least of which was the cost. But if the relationship between the two households of the Jewish family, namely,Israel and the Diaspora, has risen nearer to the top of the many pressing issues on the worldwide Jewish agenda, it makes sense that federation leaders try to make a Jerusalem GA more than a jubilee event.

Jonathan Berkowitz, president of the Jewish Federation of Vancouver succinctly expressed what seemed so obvious at the end of last week's proceedings. "At no previous GA did it make as much sense to discuss Israel-Diaspora relations as it did at this GA. It gave us an enhanced understanding of what Diaspora means to both Israelis and North Americans. As well, it gave us, Jews of the Diaspora, an enhanced understanding of what it means to be an Israeli."

A four-day conference, though meaningful and insightful, is only the beginning of understanding. The recently concluded provocative and thought-provoking GA should be the impetus for federation leaders to ensure that the pursuit of such understanding is ongoing and that it did not start and then end in Jerusalem, in November 1998.

Thanks from 'down under' to Jews of 1938

It is now 60 years since I left Berlin with my parents only four nights before the Kristallnacht disasters, and set out to cross the Atlantic by Duchess of Bedford to Montreal.

Then followed an unforgettable four-day train journey across Canada by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Vancouver, where the much longer sea voyage on the M.V. Aorangi awaited us, en route to Sydney, Australia. I was only nine at the time, but shall never forget that train journey, the freezing cold and scenery. But what will remain forever in my mind, was the sight of Canadian Jews on all of the major rail platforms at which we stopped, turning out both day and night to meet the trainload of refugees from Germany they had been told to expect. Out in the freezing cold and snow there stood small and larger groups of our people, with sandwiches and cakes and coffee, to wish us well on our way, and celebrate our close escape.

I often think, how these Jews may have been descendants of Kishinev pogrom survivors, showing their solidarity.

Would there had been more that could have escaped from Europe, but none of our families were able to join us postwar. And so it is never too late to remember the great mitzvah of those Canadian co-religionists, of whom a very few may still be with you, and to express an appreciation collectively to them and their communities.

Wants stories about survivors to exude optimism

I was impressed by the life stories of Holocaust survivors at the recent annual Holocaust week in Toronto. Their optimism shone through brightly for Israel and Judaism.

Perhaps our local newspapers including weekly Jewish newspapers can learn from them. Be more optimistic in reporting on Judaism and Israel!

Says Rabbi Plaut has 'simplistic' view of communism

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in his article "Communism and The Jews" asserts that the "DDR was like its model, violently anti-Israel." The facts are, that the Soviet Union was amongst the first nations to recognize the new state of Israel, and their influence amongst other left-wing governments contributed largely to a favorable UN vote in favor of recognition.

While I have no sympathy for the communists or their dogma, it is important to keep history in its proper perspective. The DDR and the Soviet Union were secular states and abjured all religions. If the German communists failed to achieve complete suppression of the churches as they did with the Jews, as Rabbi Plaut contends, then it could well be that there were very few Jews left in East Germany, whereas the practising Christian population, aided and encouraged by their co-religionists in the Vatican and elsewhere, were still attending their churches in considerable numbers. It is easier to suppress one person than 100.

It is simplistic to castigate the communists but Rabbi Plaut must be aware that many founders of the communist movement were Jews. Communism arose as a result of the repression and injustice wrought against the working classes. Karl Marx, himself a Jew, envisioned communism taking root in England after witnessing the terrible suffering brought about by the industrial revolution. Indeed, large numbers of the early Jewish immigrants to the United States and Canada were ardent socialists and communists.

Teach about genocides in Holocaust education

During the 1997-98 school year, I had the opportunity to participate as a student teacher in a Grade 12 Holocaust studies class. The teaching experience I gained over the course of the semester was excellent and my knowledge of the Holocaust grew substantially, but I was puzzled by the fact that the number of students enrolled in the class was less than half of the maximum capacity. In fact, the principal contemplated discontinuing the class due to low enrolment.

I spoke to several teachers and students about the enrolment situation and the message that I gathered from their responses was that Holocaust education is not particularly appealing to students. Many of the students I spoke to, both Jews and non-Jews, stressed that they had learned about the Holocaust at home, on television and in other school courses and therefore they felt that additional information would be repetitive and irrelevant.

I recognize that this school may not be exemplary of all high schools, but in any case, I think the ambivalence towards the Holocaust at this school is a clear indication that Holocaust education needs to be improved. My suggestion is that Holocaust classes incorporate information about other examples of genocide, from the past and present, in order to ensure that students identify with the material and appreciate the consequences of intolerance and discrimination. I am sure there are a variety of other ways in which Holocaust education can be improved and I hope to see these ideas circulated and changes implemented.

Perspectives

The Chinese-Jewish Connection

By DANEAL CHARNEY
Special to The CJN

Perhaps to a Canadian Jew, stumbling across Shanen's Bagels in a local grocery store in Beijing would seem like no big deal, but to a two-year China veteran like me, starved for Jewish symbols, it was the find of the century. The small, round rolls symbolized both the historic connection of the Jewish people to China, and a connection to the modern Jewish communities of Shanghai and Beijing.

In August, this little-known connection became apparent to television viewers around the world who watched Hilary Clinton officially open the newly restored Ohel Rachel Synagogue in the heart of Shanghai's downtown.

This event has taken 17 years to come to fruition, and has done so as a result of the persistent appeal of American Rabbi Arthur Schneier, who has been demanding that the Shanghai Education Commission vacate the building and restore it to its former glory. The building is one of several that once served the 30,000-strong Jewish community of 1940s.

The Clinton visit followed the rabbi's June visit to China, one of his many trips intended to push the government to recognize Judaism as a religion. With Hong Kong's return to China, the country's mainland Jewish community of 400 increased by 600 percent, strengthening Rabbi Schneier's position. Overnight the Jewish community numbered almost 3,000.

In China proper, the rate of Jewish travellers continues to climb by 30 percent a year, which includes students, professionals, and those who decide to make their home in China. I have met several of the latter, many of whom have Chinese spouses.

The restoration of one of the seven Jewish synagogues in Shanghai is an exciting but unfinished story. Whether the Chinese government will restore the other synagogues remains to be seen, as does how they will be used. So far, it is not even clear to what degree the government will allow the current synagogue to be open to the Jewish public.

Another question is who will use the premises, since the Shanghai community is a divided one. This past Passover, for instance, three separate seders were organized, one by Chabad Lubavitch, one by the Israeli consulate and one by a family.

Still, there are some signs that this community can revive itself. Twenty months ago, under the leadership of Shanghai resident Seth Kaplan, the B'nai Israel congregation was founded to welcome Jews of all denominations.

The Chinese-Jewish connection is an unusual and little-known tale. There are many theories as to why Jews came to China in the eighth century, and even more as to why they created a permanent settlement in Kaifeng, Henan, in the 11th century. Some say these Jews were members of one of the lost tribes of Israel. Others feel that they were escaping the persecution following the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, and were attracted by the economic opportunity and tolerance towards Jews in China.

Judging from artifacts available, it seems these Jews could have been coming from several locations, including Persia, Yemen, and India. They prayed in Hebrew, observed Jewish dietary laws and built a synagogue.

One of the most important artifacts documenting their lives is a 1949 stone inscription which still stands near the courtyard where the old Kaifeng synagogue was located. The inscription mentions that some 70 Jewish families living in the city formed the first Kaifeng community, residents with the family names Li, Chao, Chu, Shih, Chang, Kai and Ai. Some researchers believe the name Li represented the descendants of the Levis.

Over the centuries, the Jews of Kaifeng became indistinguishable from the local population except that they retained their abstention from eating pork. Today, those who claim to be descendants of the "Kaifeng Jews" look similar to Han Chinese but still share an interest in their Jewish roots. The Jews of Kaifeng were known there as Lan Mao Hui Hui (Blue Capped Muslims or "Mohammadums"), referring to the skull cap they wore on their heads. Since both the Muslims and Jews followed the custom of wearing skull caps, and did not eat pork, they were often lumped together by Han Chinese.

By the 1900s, only 140 Chinese Jews remained in Kaifeng. Ironically, the tolerance and lack of threat that originally attracted Jews to China also made it easy for them to assimilate. The Kaifeng synagogue and texts were destroyed several times, and with a general lack of central leadership, the community dispersed and intermarriage increased significantly.

Today, there still are Chinese who claim to be of Jewish descent. Among them are Shih Hung-Mo, an elderly gentleman living in Taiwan. In an interview with Rabbi Marvin Tokayer in 1974, Shih said that his ancestors came to Kunming at the beginning of the Ming dynasty or shortly after 1368. Currently, Shih lives a life of solitude in Taiwan, and claims the reason for this is that he was not able to find a "Blue Mohammedan" (his word for Jewish) girl.

The Chinese Jewish historical connection is a story with a happy ending. Relative religious tolerance allowed the Jews to live peacefully for hundreds of years; and in this century, Jews were able to seek refuge there from the Russian pogroms and the persecution of the Nazis. In 1949, China played a humanitarian role by permitting up to 20,000 Jews to enter without visas. China was the only country in the world that did not close its doors to Jews after 1938.

China thus became known as a haven for Jews in the 20th century. Following the Russian revolutions and pogroms, Russian Jews fled to Harbin and later Shanghai. With the rise of Nazi Germany, the Jewish numbers again increased. At its height, the Jewish community of China numbered more than 30,000, a proportionally large amount in a community of only about 100,000 foreigners. Most of the Jews lived in Tianjin, Harbin and Shanghai.

The Shanghai community was the largest and most vibrant Jewish community in 20th-century China and included Sephardim, Russian Jews and Jewish refugees. At its height, the Jewish community had its own synagogues, shops, clubs and hospitals.

Three of the most notable Sephardi Jewish families were the Sassoons, the Hardoons and the Kadoories. These families invested heavily in China's economic growth and left their mark in different ways. The Peace Hotel, for example, is one of the landmarks built by Victor Sassoon in 1840.

Although after the 1950s most foreigners left China, Jews were still proportionately over-represented among those who stayed to build the "new China." For example, American Sidney Rittenberg, who had lived in China since the late 1940s, was one of a small group of foreigners to have become high ranking Communist party members. (Rittenberg currently lives in the United States with his Chinese wife, Yulin.)

The formalized relations between Israel and China since 1993 have led to increased economic and social exchanges. The growing interest in Judaism among Chinese academics led to the foundation of the Centre for Jewish and Israeli Studies in Shanghai and a four-year curriculum in Hebrew language and literature at the Beijing university. The Shanghai centre also arranges tours of the old Jewish quarters in Hongkew.

At the unveiling of the Monument for Holocaust Survivors in Hongkew in 1994, (from left) Gen. Moshe Marom, IDF attache in Beijing; and Rabbi and Mrs. Arthur Schneier.

In 1994, the International Seminar of Jews in Shanghai brought together some 200 Jews who call Shanghai their "home city." Most of the attendees, who came from the United States, Israel, Austria, France, the United Kingdom and Germany, lived in Shanghai's Hongkew district after fleeing the Nazis.

The late Shaul Eisenberg, a business tycoon and founder of the Eisenberg Group of Companies, was among those whose "home city" became Shanghai after he escaped from Germany in 1940. Eisenberg later came back to Shanghai as an investor, and was involved in several successful joint ventures, among them the Y.P. Glass Factory.

Young modern Jews like me have found personal and professional reasons to travel to China. But the nicest surprise has been that we have found a piece of our roots there. Last November, a group of 13 Jewish young people set off to Kaifeng to hold a Shabbat dinner. It was attended by some members of the local Jewish community who had not shared this tradition in a long time.

Memories provide lasting legacy

In parshat Chaye Sarah we read that in order to bury his wife properly, Abraham needed to purchase a suitable site – the cavern of Machpelah, today located in the city of Hebron.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Sadly, the question of ownership of the tombs of the patriarchs and matriarchs has elicited terrible atrocities on both sides of the current Israeli-Palestinian conflict. These deaths are desecrations of the whole idea of why we bury and continue to honor the dead.

Burial marked with respect and dignity is as old as humanity. Even Neanderthals buried their dead with ceremony, thereby attaching meaning to the lives they had lived. Life and its termination were raised above the level of animal existence.

Our ritual of shivah does at least two things: it allows the mourner to receive the community's sympathy in a dignified way, asserting that the living are going to be supported by the community; and it allows time to recall the deeds of the one who has died. Those who come to pray with the mourners are those whose lives have been touched by the person no longer alive. Having been both a mourner and a comforter gives us a sense of awe at the power of the ceremonies that mark our going.

As a mourner, I have been offered a great legacy – stories about my parents and grandparents who touched many lives. These were not famous people, but they were good people and important people to communities that loved and needed them.

When I was a mourner, I did not seek the cold comfort of being told they had gone to a better place. This world, my world, I thought, the world of their grandchildren, was a good world, and I am angry that they were taken from it before they could see their grandchildren grown, their gardens flourishing. They were great travellers. So often I think, "How they would have loved to see..." and I feel as hurt now as when they died. That feeling of not being able to share with them experiences I know they would relish has never left me, although my parents have been dead over 10 years.

We keep them alive by telling stories.

This year, sadly, has brought me to many shivahs. We can never recover from some losses – the pain is too monstrous. Yet each person's life has had its own stories that will sustain the survivors through the early days and later remain as a true monument to the person who has died. The deeds of loving-kindness they did will be held close by families and friends.

One story: David's clothing business went bankrupt, and he was out of a job, with a family to support. When he opened a small clothing contracting business, a woman appeared who helped him set it up. Years later, his son, visiting him in retirement, asked who that woman was and where she came from.

And this is the story David told his son: During the Depression, he and Tony worked together in the clothing business, David as a cutter and Tony as a presser. David became foreman, and Tony lost his job. Every week when David visited Tony's family, he left $20 on the table. Then a job as a cutter opened up, but David's plea to hire Tony was rebuffed, since a presser is unskilled but a cutter needs a great deal of skill. So David proposed a solution. Make Tony the foreman (an easy job) and David would go back to being a cutter and losing his foreman's much better salary. The owner, amazed, agreed, and Tony had a job again.

Later Tony started his own business and prospered. When David went broke, it was Tony who sent his skilled worker – the woman – to help David.

David was my father-in-law. This story seems a fitting epitaph to a deeply caring man. It is the kind of story that brings the dead back to life every time it is told.

Nov. 26 is my mother's yahrzeit. Not only do I light a candle, but I look at pictures of all of us together, take out her college yearbook and read the whimsical prophecies her classmates made for her. I look at documents she left and books she read. I look at her as a young teacher in a picture with her class. I remember the many people whose lives she touched as teacher, mentor and musician.

Judaism wisely does not overspeculate on life after death. What remains with us are not only the stories of our loved ones, which as survivors we are obliged to tell, but also their deeds, which we are obliged to continue. Then they will truly remain bound up in life.

Too much democracy not a good thing

Last month, in conjunction with our municipal elections, Albertans had the opportunity to vote for two "senators-in-waiting" – nonexistent positions created by Alberta's Conservative government at the urging of the Reform party of Canada. The official explanation was that the election was being held to demonstrate to the federal government, and to the country as a whole, the depth of support for a so-called Triple-E Senate, a Senate that is elected, equal and effective.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

When a Senate vacancy arose during the campaign, the election promised to be at least mildly interesting. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien spoiled the party, however, when he appointed the highly respected Doug Roche – former Tory MP and disarmament ambassador – to the Senate prior to election day. The end result was that, except for a few unknown independents, only the Reform party fielded candidates, and only a small percentage of those who voted in the municipal election bothered to cast a ballot in the "senator-in-waiting" contest.

The successful Reformers now have the dubious distinction of having won this questionable exercise in democracy. Their reward? To sit and wait, I guess.

Senate reform is, however, an issue that deserves serious attention. Triple-E is one idea. But it is not the only idea. For example, perhaps we should simply abolish the Senate altogether. And a third idea was contained in the Charlottetown Accord of 1992. The Senate envisioned there was elected, equal and somewhat effective. Interestingly, the Reform party was in the vanguard of those who opposed the accord, and when it was defeated in the national referendum of 1992, Senate reform was defeated as well.

The Triple-E proposal is essentially the grafting of an American-style Senate onto the British system of parliamentary democracy. Will it work? Who knows? The U.S. Senate is part of a republican system of government, with a strict separation of powers, and checks and balances among the three equal branches of government – the executive branch, the Congress and the courts. This is not our system, of course; so it requires much more study to determine whether a Triple-E Senate would enhance our system of government or have negative or adverse effects on it.

Constitutional reform can often have unforeseen and detrimental effects on democratic systems of government. A case in point is Israel's Direct Election Law. This month we have seen more graphic evidence of the serious and unfortunate effects that this law is having on Israeli democracy.

Throughout most of its history, Israel has had a system of parliamentary democracy based upon the British model. Prior to the last national elections, Israel decided to engage in a little constitutional tinkering: They grafted onto the parliamentary model an American-style direct election of the prime minister. The result was that Israelis decided, in massive numbers, to split their votes: When casting their ballot for the Knesset, they voted for a different party from that of the candidate they chose as prime minister. Consequently, the major parties, Likud and Labor, lost seats; and the second tier parties, Shas, NRP, Meretz, and the third tier parties Yisrael b'Aliyah and the Third Way gained seats.

The Direct Election Law was applied to this month's municipal elections as well. The results this time were even more pronounced. Although Likud and Labor were able to hold most of the mayoralty positions, the two major parties were decimated in the council elections. For example, while Likud's Ehud Olmert was re-elected mayor of Jerusalem with a large majority (61 percent), his party won only 6.6 percent of the vote and three seats on the 31-seat Jerusalem City Council. Labor's Shimon Shetreet won 23 percent of the mayoralty votes but his party received only six percent of the votes and two seats. The big winners in Jerusalem were Shas, the Sephardi religious party, and Meretz, the leftist party. Elsewhere, the story was the same: some huge losses for Likud and Labor and significant gains for Shas, Meretz and particularly Natan Sharansky's immigrants' party, Yisrael b'Aliyah.

A number of potentially disastrous consequences may arise: the development of even more pronounced schisms in Israeli society between left and right, religious and secular; an increase in the number of third tier "one issue parties;" a further reduction in the strength of the two main parties; the development of personal as opposed to party power bases; the need for a greater number of coalition partners in order to achieve a majority, which makes governance almost impossible. The prime minister (or the mayor) is a hostage to his coalition partners.

National elections are not far off. Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon believes there may be more than 20 parties contesting the next election and that Labor and Likud could be reduced to only 20 seats each. The prospect is for a government unable to act, straitjacketed by its coalition agreements, and paralyzed by the fear of losing power.

Likud and Labor should get together before it is too late. They should form a national unity government for the express purpose of repealing the Direct Election Law. One vote is good, but two votes are not necessarily better. Too much democracy is not a good thing!

Germany – The latest attraction for Jews

What would have appeared as the ultimate impossibility 50 years ago has now become a strange reality. Germany is a nation that today can boast the fastest growing Jewish community in the Diaspora.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In cities where yesterday no Jews lived, small communities are springing up. An example is the "other Frankfurt," not the one located on the River Main which has one of the largest Jewish communities in the country, but the Frankfurt east of Berlin that, until recently, had no Jews at all. In September, a small congregation gathered there for a meal of gefilte fish and sweetened apples to celebrate its first Rosh Hashanah. Formed in June, the community has 60 members and is just one of the many fledgling congregations now taking root in cities all over the country.

Signs of the rebirth of Jewish culture are evident. Two weeks ago, the cornerstone was laid for a new synagogue in Kassell, a city in Hessen that could once boast a 1,000-year-old Jewish presence. In Berlin, a Jewish quarter with kosher restaurants and shops is emerging near the famous New Synagogue, whose golden dome can be seen throughout the city. According to a Munich newspaper, architects have plans for the construction or reconstruction of some 30 synagogues across the land.

Most of the present growth can be attributed to Jewish immigration from the former Soviet Union. According to Andreas Nachama, chair of Berlin's Jewish congregation, one of the group's most important tasks is integrating its Russian members and welcoming these newcomers, many of whom have yet to experience the religion of their forebears.

Ignatz Bubis, head of the Central Committee of Jews in Germany, said, according to Week in Germany: "The new members of the Jewish community will demand and draw out to an ever greater extent our solidarity, our strength and our creativity."

The same publication also has the following information: There is a new Jewish museum being developed in Berlin, and its new director is Michael Blumenthal, former U.S. secretary of the treasury, who, when quitting his American post, decided to accept the directorship of the museum, which he hopes to make into a world-class institution and a show-piece for the city. It will document the high points of Jewish culture in Germany and the contribution of Jewish citizens to the creation of the modern Jewish nation. Also, said Blumenthal, it will explore the tragic side of German-Jewish history – centuries of discrimination, the catastrophe of National Socialism, emigration and the Holocaust – as well as the revival of German-Jewish culture in recent years.

Recently, American movie director Steven Spielberg was honored by the president of the German Republic. In his address, the president spoke of Schindler's List as a universal landmark, and of the Spielberg Foundation, which has assembled tens of thousands of television interviews with survivors, as an important contribution not only to Jewish but also to German history.

The Kirshner File

Life according to Assi Dayan

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When film director Assi Dayan accepted two awards at last year's Israeli Oscar ceremony for his newest movie, The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum, he was typically outspoken.

He lambasted the government for not giving the industry sufficient financial support. And, in a dig at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policies, he wondered out loud whether "there will even be a country next year."

Not one to mince his words, Dayan – the son of a legendary Israeli leader – is a quintessential iconoclast. And like most Israelis he is extravagantly opinionated.

A committed atheist, he is highly critical of the growing religiosity in Israel. A dyed-in-the-wool leftist, he despises the current Israeli government, and is sharply critical of yordim and Jews in the Diaspora. An acerbic observer of Israeli society, he complains that the present generation is ignorant of the past.

Dayan, who is also an actor, a novelist, a poet, a journalist and a broadcaster, is one of three children fathered by Moshe and Ruth Dayan. His brother, Ehud, is a sculptor. His sister, Yael, sits as a Labor party member of the Knesset.

He was here recently to promote The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum and another one of his movies, Life According to Agfa, at an Israeli film festival sponsored by Cinematheque Ontario.

In person, Dayan, 53, is a rumpled, distracted figure in drab, loose-fitting clothes who speaks with a rasp, smokes incessantly and sips beer from a can. At times, he suddenly breaks from the interview to address a publicist in attendance.

Except for his full head of hair, he bears a remarkable resemblance to Micky Baum, the somnolent and doleful movie character who's hopelessly ravaged by cancer, and who has 92 minutes to live. In line with a recurring theme in several of his previous films, The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum – a mordant comedy – turns on the idea that life can be bone-crushingly banal, and is composed of a series of accidents, the meaning of which remain unknown.

Interestingly enough, Dayan's own life partially falls into this random pattern. Born in Tel Aviv, Dayan fell into the film business, not by design, but by accident. While on vacation from university, where he studied philosophy and English literature, he worked on a low-budget Israeli movie. It was a defining experience which set him on his way.

During the next few years, he appeared as an actor in such Israeli and foreign films as Five Days in Sinai, A Walk With Love And Death, Promise at Dawn and Operation Thunderbolt. The last three were directed by seasoned veterans John Huston, Jules Dassin and Menahem Golan.

While pursuing his budding acting career, Dayan churned out a series of forgettable thrillers and comedies, and directed such films as Saint Cohen, a drama, and Long Live Israel, a satire. As a director, his breakthrough came with Life According to Agfa, the first of a trilogy, starring Gila Almagor, which took nine out of 11 Israeli Oscars in 1992. It was followed by The Electric Blanket, a comedy which won two Israeli Oscars, and The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum, which picked up an equal number of prizes.

"I didn't follow in my father's footsteps," said Dayan, who was a paratrooper in the Israeli army. "I didn't become a general."

Dayan's father, who was variously chief of staff, agricultural minister, defence minister and foreign minister, never tried to influence his career choices. "He said, 'Do whatever you want.' He was a liberal. He said that I should pay for my mistakes."

In her memoirs, My Father, His Daughter (1985), Dayan's older sister, Yael, claims that Assi struggled "to fight for an identity apart from the famous name he carried," and that Dayan became "very difficult to live with."

Asked to elaborate, he said that he had no trouble living in his father's shadow, that he left home at the age of 18, that he generally had a good relationship with him, and that he inherited his brooding pessimism.

Dayan, though, was never intimidated by his heroic aura. "At home, he wasn't a legend, but a tired man with shorts."

He and his father did not often discuss politics. But before the Six Day War, he shared his pragmatic political beliefs. After 1967, however, he parted ways with Dayan, coming to believe that Israel should withdraw from every inch of the territories in exchange for peace. "We could have saved the lives of thousands of soldiers if we had immediately withdrawn," he observed.

Although he ran unsuccessfully for the Knesset as a left-wing Shelli candidate some 20 years ago, Dayan admits that he has never voted in a general election. " I'm an individual and I don't find any party close to my views."

Dayan is not impressed by the Wye Memorandum, signed by Israel and the Palestine Authority recently. "It's not a peace treaty, but some kind of an arrangement," he sniffed. Nor does he like Netanyahu. "He's a horrible man, a small guy who should be selling used cars. I hate his politics. He's destructive and he's a fascist. Netanyahu and his group have taken the joy and the vision out of peace."

A contributor to Israel's two leading dailies, Yediot Aharonot and Maariv, he mourns Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. "If he had been alive, I'd be going to a film festival in Damascus, not Toronto."

Raised in a thoroughly secular Zionist household, he did not have a bar mitzvah. Nor does he practise Judaism. "I don't think I was ever in a synagogue in my life."

Dayan, who has been married four times and has four children ranging in age from 15 to 26, claims that Israel is on the verge of becoming a theocratic state, "like Iran or Pakistan." Indignantly, he added, "I don't want to live in such a country."

A resident of the leafy Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan, he has no intention of leaving Israel, if only because Hebrew is so precious to him, the language in which he writes his scripts, his newspaper columns, his poems and his novels, the first of which, Table of Contents, was published in 1989. Striking a rare buoyant chord, he said that the 19th century revival of Hebrew as an everyday living language was "a wonderful thing."

Assi Dayan

As a filmmaker, Dayan prefers screenwriting and directing to acting because the first two functions require more creativity. But judging by his reviews and the honors he has amassed, Dayan is widely respected as a thespian. One of the Israeli films in which he starred, Beyond the Walls, garnered an Academy Award nomination for best foreign film in 1986.

Probably because he thinks that a high proportion of Israeli films are well made, he bemoans the financial restraints under which directors like himself labor. Dayan, who makes movies on a shoestring (The 92 Minutes of Mr. Baum, for example, cost all of $350,000 US), charged that government subsidies are drying up because the haredi ministers who dispense them are indifferent to cinema, and resent the fact that popular Israeli culture is produced by leftists.

In parting shots, Dayan accused young Israelis of being uninformed of Israel's history ("They don't know anything about my father"), derided Israeli emigrants abroad as money-hungry and selfish, and denounced Diaspora Jews. As he put it:"They send me to wars while they lounge in Jaccuzis. They like to watch CNN showing Israeli soldiers shooting rubber bullets at Palestinians. It's a shame, and I don't understand it."

An Otzma education

Not very often in our lifetime do we have the opportunity to truly touch the lives of others, to walk into one's community and ask how I, the self within, can make a genuine, unique and positive contribution to that place. Understandably, commitments always seem to get in the way somehow.

As a participant this past year on Project Otzma, I had the opportunity to delay these obligations in exchange for a rewarding year of personal growth, cultural learning, and social outreach.

Project Otzma is a 10-month fellowship sponsored by the Council of Jewish Federations that enables select participants from North America to spend a year performing valuable community service in Israel.

This past year on Otzma, I learned about the State of Israel and all of its cultural beauty. I learned that the apparent abrasiveness I confronted daily in the streets of Jerusalem, Eilat and Nazareth Illit were merely disguises for the warmth, generosity, and overwhelming kindness that I felt every time someone invited me to their home for a Shabbat dinner.

I learned that wherever I was in Israel, whether in the magnificence of the north or the solitude of the Negev, there was a familial bond amongst Israelis throughout the country.

I felt this bond during Yom Hazikaron, as Israelis mourned the loss of their loved ones who had fallen during Israel's wars. I also felt it a day later on Yom Ha'atzmaut, when they celebrated with sheer joy and jubilation their 50 years of statehood. And I felt it at the two-year anniversary of the death of Yitzchak Rabin, as hundreds of thousands came to support their fallen leader. I understood all of this, but now I understand.

This past year on Otzma, I learned about the State of Israel and all of its political complexity. I learned that two sides can be perfectly right and perfectly wrong at exactly the same time.

I witnessed the prejudice that exists on each side, the bitter raging hatred which makes it seemingly impossible to achieve any positive political outcome.

I journeyed into the West Bank and listened to a Palestinian plead that his family suffers for days without food when the territories are sealed and that we should not condemn the many innocent for the atrocious acts of the guilty few. I heard the drowning cries of a mother whose son was killed by a bomb on Diezengoff. And I observed the protests of those fighting for the removal of soldiers from Lebanon, wondering why we must continue to lose the ones we love. I wondered if there would ever be an end to any of this.

Most importantly, though, this past year on Otzma I learned about the joys that lie in helping my fellow human being. I saw the joy in an Ethiopian mother's face as she was reunited with her son after six weeks of separation and anguish, and I felt the joy in knowing that I helped to prepare for his arrival from Addis Ababa.

I experienced the satisfaction of knowing that the autistic children that I taught to ride bicycles in Ra'anana would now be able to experience one of the most traditional joys of childhood. I experienced the gratification of knowing that I facilitated the growth of a young Conservative congregation in Eilat by initiating a monthly newsletter for them.

I felt the struggle of young Russian immigrants in their difficult adjustment to a new culture and a new language, and I felt proud in knowing that I had done something positive to alleviate their burden. And I felt honored in working with seven children with Down syndrome because their ability to love and be loved far surpassed that of anyone I had ever met. I learned that helping others really means helping myself.

This past year on Project Otzma, I touched the lives of others; but more accurately, I was touched by the lives of others.

There's plenty of Wye

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This week we continue our look at some of the many Internet sites related to last month's signing of the Wye River Memorandum.

The agreement has been reproduced on many Web sites such as the Jerusalem Post's [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Wye/], which also has a summary of the memorandum's highlights and links to stories about local reaction to the announcement of the signing.

The Memorandum wasn't the only significant document which came out of Wye. Others letters were circulated, such as a side letter from U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright which affirms the United States' "ironclad commitment to Israel's security and to peace, and to stress that Palestinian security undertakings are a critical foundation of the Memorandum" [http://www.israelwire.com/New/981025/98102538.html].

Several other Letters of Assurance were exchanged in the week following the agreement [http://www.pmo.gov.il/english/policy/wye-2a.html].

The Prime Minister's site provides an analysis of the accord [http://www.pmo.gov.il/english/policy/wye-4.html]. It says the Memorandum was a necessity because the 1995 Interim Agreement between Israel and the Palestinians [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00qa0] had become deadlocked. But now "with renewed and strengthened Palestinian undertakings to fight terrorists and their infrastructure, the Memorandum provides that the further redeployment phases may now take place."

The Palestinian National Authority has established its own official Web site [http://www.pna.net/]. Its Peace Process section contains a copy of the Memorandum, an analysis of the agreement and a section titled Israeli Violations of the Wye Memorandum [http://www.pna.net/peace/israeli_violations_of_the_wye_me.htm].

One of the key agreements at Wye was the amendment of the Palestinian National Charter to remove anti-Israel articles. The Charter has been reproduced in its entirety along with the various clauses which are to be amended, such as "Article 9: Armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine" [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00pv0].

Recently, Yasser Arafat reaffirmed his commitment to repeal those anti-Israel clauses when the Palestine National Council meets in December [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/12.Nov.1998/News/Article-1.html].

Hamas' "Covenant of the Islamic Resistance Movement" can also be found online [http://wiretap.spies.com/Gopher/Gov/World/hamas.cov].

News about the implementation of the Wye Memorandum changes from day to day. CNNinteractive has created a large site called Struggle for Peace where you can check in on the latest developments [http://cnn.com/WORLD/struggle_for_peace/index.html]. You'll find a chronology of events, biographies of some of the key figures and links to related sites. And there is also a Middle East conflict message board where you can air your own views.

And for something a bit different, it's always worth checking in with Yaakov Kirschen's cartoon "Drybones" for his take on the peace process [http://drybones.org.il/COMICS99.HTML]. One recent offering: "The GOOD news is that we and the Palestinians have FINALLY agreed on a path that we can follow together. The BAD news is that each side THINKS that the road is leading to a DIFFERENT place."

Rabbinic Reflections

Holy Shabbat angels

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

One of the most beloved of Jewish songs is Shalom Aleichem of Shabbat evening. However, in this song there is a bit of an anomaly in the last verse.

The source of the song is the notion that on Friday evening two angels accompany us as we enter our homes. Upon seeing the home prepared for Shabbat, the angels offer us a brachah. In our song, in the first stanza we welcome the angels with "Shalom Aleichem," in the second stanza we invite them into our home with "Boachem l'shalom," in the third stanza we ask them to bless us "Barchuni" and in the fourth stanza we usher them out the door "Tseitchem l'shalom."

Out the door so fast? Let the angels stay a bit, relax, spend some time with us – why are we ushering them out the door so fast? We could have left this stanza out entirely and ended the song with our request for them to bless us.

Now I know this isn't the deepest question in the world. After all, it's only a song about angels. However, there is an interesting concept that I believe gives a different twist to the song.

In our Torah portion, Vayeitsei, Rashi makes a famous comment on the vision of Jacob and the ladder. Jacob, fleeing from the Land of Israel in order to save his life from his threatening brother Esau, lies down and has a dream of angels ascending and descending a ladder. Rashi comments that as Jacob leaves the Land of Israel there is a changing of the guard of his guardian angels. When he returns to the Land of Israel in the very last verses of this portion, the angels change again, this time because he is now entering the Land.

One may deduce from the Torah and the midrash that the holiness of the Land of Israel demands a different type of angel. You have holy guardian angels of the Land of Israel and you have less holy angels for outside of the Land of Israel. Hence Jacob has a dream as he leaves the Land of Israel and sees the switching of the angels of the Holy Land and angels of outside the Land.

I think that this is the image of the angels of Shabbat. We have weekday angels, but when Shabbat comes, as we enter a holy time, we have a changing of the angels from weekday angels to Shabbat angels. We welcome in our holy Shabbat angels, greeting them, ushering them into our home, asking for their blessing. At the same time, our weekday angels are leaving us. We wish them well as they take leave of us for Shabbat, before we return our attention back to our Shabbat angels.

The last paragraph of Shalom Aleichem is not addressed to the Shabbat angels who are going to be with us for the entire holy time of Shabbat, but to the weekday angels who are taking leave of us for the day, to return after Shabbat.

What a beautiful image: on the holy day of Shabbat, we spend the day with holy angels. Not only is the day a special day of rest, clothing and delicious food, but it is also a holy day to be spent with holy pursuits, while under special holy protection of the unique Shabbat angels.

The Life Of Thomas More*, by Peter Ackroyd (Chatto & Windus, $45).

Thomas More had the misfortune to serve as lord chancellor to King Henry VIII when the 36-year-old monarch was trying to rid himself of Catherine of Aragon, his Spanish wife of 18 years, despite the opposition of the Catholic Church.

The problem was crystal clear to Henry, "All such issue males as I have received of the Queen died immediately after they were born; so that I fear the punishment of God."

The source of the trouble had been written down in Scripture for all to read: "If a man shall take his brother's wife, it is an unclean thing; he hath uncovered his brother's nakedness; they shall be childless" — and Catherine had been married to his older brother Arthur. It made no difference that the queen swore that she had left her 15-year-old husband's marriage bed still a virgin, or that the papacy had granted a dispensation to void the biblical prohibition.

In an Oxford college library there is a priceless, pristine set of the Talmud printed in Venice (1520-1523) that the king procured, hoping that the talmudic interpretation of the more permissive laws of the Hebrew Bible would prove the pope wrong.

In addition, the king asked the opinion of some Italian rabbis, and one dared to side with him. All of this at a time when the Jews, expelled in 1290, were still forbidden to step foot in England.

Mistress Anne Boleyn, a talented and vivacious lady-in-waiting at the court, was available and the king was adamant about a divorce.

The king turned to More for his help and advice as a successful lawyer, diplomat and seasoned politician.

Those around Henry were compelled to enter an unacknowledged pact of silence about the king's motives. The atmosphere at court had become difficult as well as delicate and those, like More, who supported Catherine of Aragon had to tread cautiously. One of the games being played was that of waiting, since they hoped the king's attraction to Anne was nothing more than infatuation.

"It is likely to have been in this period that Henry made his famous visit to More's house in Chelsea, where he walked in the gardens with his arm around his counsellor's neck. The king's affection may or may not have been genuine on that occasion, but More probably shuddered at the touch; scrupulous and reticent as he was, he would have wished to keeping his distance in order to preserve his integrity."

More, a poet and humanist, translated many of the Latin classic writings. His most famous work, Utopia, was published in Latin in 1516. It describes an imaginary commonwealth governed entirely by reason.

An ambiguous and sometimes capricious personality, More mingled cruelty with his saintliness and caution with his candor. He engaged in religious zealotry, vilified the followers of Luther and condemned several heretics to the stake.

"In his vituperative attacks on Luther, More is no longer taking part in an elaborate literary exercise; he is fighting for the life of his world, which, he believes, will otherwise be extinguished by uncertainty and doubt. The battle between the two men is like an internalized conflict between the warring selves of 16th-century civilization."

In 1534, Parliament proclaimed Henry "Supreme Head of the Church of England." An oath of loyalty to the crown was now required of all subjects; dissent was tantamount to treason. All of this was too much for More who refused to take the oath and resigned his position.

In July 1535, More was beheaded. In mounting the scaffold he cracked his famous sick joke "I pray you, I pray you, Mr. Lieutenant, see me safe up, and for my coming down let me shift for myself."

It wasn't until 1886 that the Roman Catholic Church declared More to be blessed, and not until 1935 that it conferred full martyr's honor upon him. As the historian Lacey B. Smith wrote "More was never a comfortable saint."

Ackroyd is knowledgeable and witty, a keen delineator of personality and a superb stylist. His previous eight novels and four biographies have been well received. The Life of Thomas More is a dramatic life story of a complex character whom Erasmus labelled, "A man for all seasons." He meant it as a compliment, but other interpretations are possible.

CIC welcomes probe of charities

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is welcoming efforts by federal solicitor-general Andy Scott to strip the charitable status of organizations which raise money for terrorist groups abroad.

Scott is seeking, for the second time, cabinet approval for his plan, which would remove tax breaks for groups suspected of being fronts for terrorist organizations, including those linked to the Middle East.

The CIC has long been concerned with the presence in Canada of organizations which raise money and provide moral support for Hezbollah and Hamas, said its research director, David Goldberg.

Several years ago, the CIC issued a report to Canada's foreign affairs ministry, expressing concern over domestic fundraising for Middle East terror groups, and recommending safeguards.

Goldberg said it's difficult, but not impossible, to find a "comfort zone" in which legitimate groups can continue to raise money for legitimate causes, but where a crackdown can be legislated against other organizations that fund terrorism.

Goldberg said there's "no doubt" money is being raised in Canada for Hamas and Hezbollah.

Often, he said, organizations with ties to Mideast terror operate under the guise of social welfare and charity groups or clubs, all with innocent sounding names.

While it's nearly impossible to crack down on the transfer of cash, Ottawa can eliminate the charitable tax status of some organizations, Goldberg noted.

Scott wants to create a new legal process, in which closed-door hearings before the Federal Court would be presented with highly sensitive evidence from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). If found guilty, organizations linked to terror would be stripped of the tax benefits available to charities and non-profit groups.

But Scott's plan, an earlier version of which was rejected by the cabinet, has not met with sympathy from his colleagues, who fear it would violate the civil rights of groups engaged in legitimate fundraising.

Some cabinet members reportedly objected to the idea of closed-door hearings, in which lawyers for the suspected organizations would be barred from the courtroom.

Last week, revenue minister Herb Dhaliwal told reporters he does not see evidence of any charities raising money for groups linked to terror.

In June, CSIS director Ward Elcock told a Senate committee that his agency is investigating about 50 organizations in Canada, including groups with ties to Hamas and Hezbollah.

Last year, CSIS said Hezbollah has established an infrastructure in Canada that can assist terrorists seeking safe haven in North America.

Russian Jews Squeeze In To Get Out

By Adi Neuberger

It's standing room only in Jewish Agency run Hebrew classes throughout Moscow as thousands of Jews prepare to make aliyah to escape economic turmoil and rising anti-Semitism.

The demand for space at Hebrew language classes in Moscow and other major Russian cities has almost tripled over the last 6 months, reports Alla Levy, director of Eastern European Operations for the Jewish Agency. Close to 10,000 potential olim, most from Russia's decimated middle class, are clamoring for spots - the highest number in 1998.

"We're simply runnning out of space," admits Levy in an interview with Community Matters.

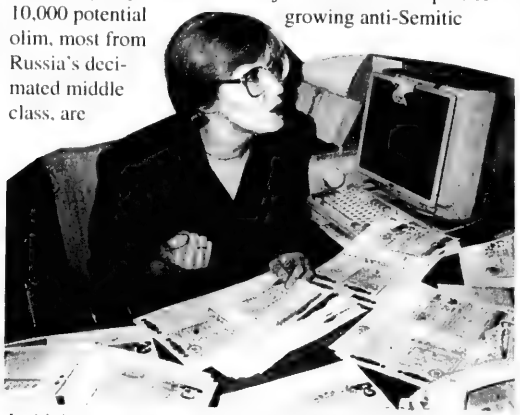
Levy is desperately searching for additional classrooms to accommodate what she calls a "tremendous need," among Jewish professionals between 25 and 40 years of age, who see emigration to Israel as their only hope for the future.

Levy says widespread job loss and the impact of growing anti-Semitic sentiment within Russia's Communist party leaves the once secure middle class increasingly pessimistic about the chances for improvement.

"There's just a great deal of disillusionment and uncertainty and these people are turning to us for help," says Levy.

The Jewish Agency, funded by UJA Federation campaigns, has sent in additional manpower to help local officials deal with the long lines of applicants, many of whom require enhanced professional Hebrew language classes (Ulpans) to prepare them for entry into the Israeli workforce. The ulpans will also expand their English and computer classes to help the potential olim secure jobs in Israel's growing hi-tech sector.

Levy expects the first wave of olim currently being processed to arrive in Israel in early 1999. "These people are very serious about their plans," she notes. Many have relatives and friends already living in Israel.



Jewish Agency offices have become inundated with applications from young Jewish professionals seeking a better life in Israel.

In October alone, 9,300 Russian Jews signed up for Jewish Agency run Ulpan classes.

UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty, to raise $50 million annually by 2001, will allocate an additional $1.5 million in new funds to rescue Jews from unstable regions, such as the former Soviet Union.

Local Israelis hold gala

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Israeli Association of Greater Toronto is holding its first formal gala Dec. 6, under the official auspices of Yehudi Kinar, Israel consul general.

The gala, expected to draw 400 guests, including 60 invitees from the general Jewish community, will be held at the City Playhouse Theatre, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Thornhill, at 7 p.m. Admission is $18.

The gala will feature a showing of the popular Israeli film, Out for Love, Be Back Shortly, directed by Dan Katzir, who will attend.

The work of 24 Israeli artists will be displayed in the theatre's foyer. Many of these paintings will be for sale.

"We hope the gala and other activities will attract the second generation of Israelis in Toronto, because we need new blood," said president David Gerichter.

The association hopes that its activities will bring the 30,000 Israelis here in closer contact with the rest of the Jewish community.

Toronto has the third-largest Israeli population on the continent after New York and Los Angeles.

The inclusion of the association's address in the office of the Jewish Information Service at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, is an indication that Israelis are being accepted in the larger community, said executive coordinator Shula Jacobi.

Volunteers at the office, 635-5670, will be glad to answer any queries about the gala or Israeli events and opportunities in the city, she said.

"Many Israelis do not know the services that the organized Jewish community offers, but we are drawing closer together," said Gerichter.

He and gala chair Itia Golan paid tribute to Ward 4 Vaughan councillor Mario Racco for his help in aranging the gala. Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson and Liberal MP Elinor Caplan will be among the guests.

The mayor of Ramla, Israel, which is twinned with Vaughan, is also expected to attend.

Concert to raise funds

TORONTO — The love of Israel and concern over hunger in society are bringing together the Toronto Council of Hazzanim and Mazon Canada for a gala cantorial concert on Dec. 6 at the Holy Blossom Temple.

Ten Toronto cantors, representing various streams of Judaism, along with the Toronto Jewish Male Choir will headline the concert, called For the Love of Israel and Jewish Unity.

Funds raised at the concert, held as part of the continuing celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, will go to Mazon and scholarships for cantorial students.

Mazon Canada raises funds in the Jewish community for non-denominational allocation to front-line organizations, such as food banks, fighting hunger across Canada.

For more information about the gala concert or for tickets, call 416-789-3291.

Historian chronicles life in a Lithuanian shtetl

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some of Yaffa Eliach's colleagues said she was "a bissel meshuge" when the New York-based historian and Brooklyn College professor decided to memorialize her hometown, a Lithuanian shtetl whose Jewish community of 3,500 was virtually extinguished in the Holocaust.

"How can you document a god-forsaken small town?" she asked rhetorically in an address at the 22nd Annual Jewish Book Fair, held at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Eliach, author of There Once Was a World, spoke on A 900-Year Chronicle of the Shtetl of Eishyshok: A Portrait and Tribute to A Vanished Culture.

Her recent book about her hometown expands on the Tower of Life, which has been cited as the most powerful display in Washington's U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. A smaller exhibit of her pictures can be found in a Holocaust museum in Hiroshima, Japan.

In 1979, Eliach was sent on a fact-finding mission to eastern Europe as part of then-president Jimmy Carter's commission to establish a museum commemorating the Holocaust.

Eliach had left Europe with an aunt and uncle as a child refugee in 1945. Her mother and baby brother had been killed by local Poles after liberation, and her father had been imprisoned.

On her return, the persistent focus on death and destruction disturbed her. "I kept saying to myself, 'Is this what we want to show the public, that we Jews are only victims?' What about our history of 1,000 years in Europe? I would like a museum to include something about us as normal, creative, outstanding people."

Yaffa Eliach

She decided to use her hometown as a model of Jewish pre-war life, by collecting documents and photographs taken by local Jewish photographers, and ultimately by writing a book on the town's 900-year history.

Her collection began with the photos that were hidden in her shoe when she left Europe as a child. It grew to 10,000 images.

Although Eliach's idea was not accepted initially, she continued her research, despite a lack of funding.

Her quest took her to six continents, rummaging in attics and digging for photos buried in the ground. "You can't imagine," she said, and indeed, her ladylike demeanor, heels, long-skirted suit and elaborate updo made it difficult.

For some photos, she said, she had to pay large sums of money. In Vilna, she paid with four jogging suits.

Among her discoveries were records of the Eishyshok Jewish community having raised funds for the building of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1925. Her lecture here, appropriately enough, was sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Once Eliach began to amass material, she decided she had to return to Eishyshok.

After an emotional reunion with her former nanny – the woman who saved her life – she visited the mass graves where most of the townspeople were shot in 1941.

"I saw them the way they looked in my pictures, smiling, skiing, going to bar mitzvahs, swimming, and I could hear them talking to me and asking to be remembered the way they were."

She left with a clear vision of the type of exhibit she wanted to create, with pictures "around, above and below you," exactly as she saw the images when she stood on the mass grave.

Her pictures depict "just the way life was in the shtetl." In fact, she said, people who didn't get along in the shtetl are not next to each other in the exhibit.

The display has become a universal family album, she said, telling of a black youth who cried at the photo of her father holding her, saying it was just like his father holding him.

The Holocaust was a blueprint for genocide, said Eliach, a Holocaust education pioneer. "If we don't teach the Holocaust and study about the Holocaust, all the mistakes may be repeated."

Proper education is important not only for Jewish survival, she emphasized, but for all ethnic groups.

Canadian Associates of BGU name new national president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) pioneered the use of underground salt water irrigation to grow crops like sweet-tasting tomatoes, the institution's biggest resource is above ground, according to the new national president of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University.

That resource is brain power, said Sidney Chelsky, who succeeded Rabbi Jordan Pearlson as the organization's president in October. Rabbi Pearlson is now chairman of the board of governors.

When Chelsky was "brought in" by a United Jewish Appeal acquaintance some dozen years ago, he quickly became involved in BGU business, serving as Toronto chapter president and more recently as national treasurer. He is also a member of the university's international board of governors.

"If I'm going to get involved, it has to be 100 percent," he said in a recent interview.

Among the things that impressed him when he visited the university, he said, was the way the institution dealt with its challenges as Israel's youngest university (established 29 years ago) and those due to its desert location in Beersheva. BGU, he said, was preparing to welcome Ethiopian students at a time when no programs were yet in place for them.

Chelsky, 57, has been to Israel 14 times and might have been born there had his Polish-born mother not been advised to leave the country for health reasons.

A dry cleaning consultant for the dry cleaning, laundry and hotel industries (his children now run Careful Hand Laundry & Dry Cleaners Limited, of which he is past president), Chelsky is chair of Toronto's Better Business Bureau, and has been actively involved with over half a dozen organizations, among them Mount Sinai Hospital, where he is a member of the quality of patient care committee and of the board.

It's difficult juggling his involvements, he said, but if he deals with problems as soon as they arise, he finds he can handle almost anything.

Chelsky's wife and their four children, now grown, have always been involved in whatever charitable organizations he's been involved in, Chelsky said. His youngest son Steven, 28, is involved in the Canadian Associates' young leadership group.

Chelsky's current priority as president is to visit every city in which BGU has a presence. Those that are well established, representing the bulk of the Canadian Associates' members (over 1,000 people), are in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Other cities have a smaller or nascent presence. "I want to meet as many people as possible and share the message of the university."

Sidney Chelsky

The main purpose of the Canadian Associates is to raise funds to support the university, Chelsky said, opting not to specify a dollar amount as a goal.

"There is no real limit, because the needs are so great." The organization can use contributions of both time and money, but he also wants supporters to "be involved with the day-to-day achievements of the university."

A recent young leadership project, for example, supported the building of a greenhouse.

The group often hosts visiting faculty members for educational purposes. Prof. Charles Linder will speak here on water purification, desalination and membrane filtration processes in early December, and will offer his expertise to local officials regarding water problems here.

Chelsky derives much satisfaction from his BGU work. "Over the years my business and this community has been very good to me. I feel it's an obligation to give something back. The funny part is, I seem to be getting more out of it than what I'm giving."

Vet gets honorary position in military

TORONTO — A Jewish World War II veteran and one-time volunteer in Israel's war for independence has been named an honorary lieutenant-colonel in the Canadian military.

Norm Cohen, 75, was recently named Honorary Lieutenant-Colonel of 2 Intelligence Company, a Toronto-based combat intelligence unit. About 70 soldiers and seven officers are attached to it.

Every unit of the Canadian military is led by an honorary colonel or lieutenant-colonel, Cohen explained to The CJN. He is the first honorary leader of this particular unit.

His appointment, considered quite prestigious in military circles, was announced recently by Defence Minister Art Eggleton. It's a three-year term.

"In effect, it's a civilian/military position," Cohen said. "It's a lot of work."

The unpaid job involves fundraising for the unit and acting as an intermediary between the government and the military. Cohen may also lobby for better conditions and pay for unit members.

Lt.-Col. Norm Cohen

Cohen spent four years in Europe with the Royal Canadian Air Force and served in Burma with the RCAF's 436th Burma Squadron. For a brief period in 1948, he was a Machalnik – a foreign volunteer – in Israel's War of Independence.

'Sandwich generation' under stress

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — With children staying at home longer and seniors living longer, more parents are finding themselves in the "sandwich generation," says Dr. Ben Schlesinger, professor emeritus of the University of Toronto's faculty of social work.

Schlesinger, who recently wrote The Family Squeeze: Surviving the Sandwich Generation with Suzanne Kingsmill, told an audience at the Jewish Book Fair that 1.1 million families in Canada have children over age 20 living at home.

"It is costly to live alone today, and most adult children have to go to school longer, which costs a lot of money. It is cheaper to stay at home and go to school," Schlesinger said. "As well, young people today are not rushing into marriage, so many feel they should stay at home where all their needs are being met."

On the other hand, he said, only five percent of seniors in Canada are living in senior homes or institutions.

"The rest of the seniors are at home, and most need someone to drive them shopping, take them to the doctor or bank, or just call and visit them. They also need help filling out government forms and paying their bills. The parents in the middle have not only become the sandwich generation, but the serving generation."

Inevitably, said Schlesinger, it's the woman in the family who is the server. "Most women in their mid-40s to mid-60s work full time and [by being in the middle] they are acting as mother, wife, child, worker and homemaker. She has no time for herself."

In most cases where there is a sandwich generation, he said, there is a designated server. "There is always someone who does all the work, with no help from her siblings or husband. Sometimes the husband wants her to help his parents as well."

In his book, Schlesinger said, he asks people to determine exactly how much responsibility adults should have to their elderly parents and to their children. "Also, what responsibility should children have to their parents and grandparents, and what responsibility should the government have for seniors ? The question of responsibility is just never resolved."

On the positive side, the new reality represents "an opportunity for children to get to know their grandparents, as well as the opportunity for mutual help," Schlesinger said. "It is not a one-way road. Grandparents can help their children and grandchildren, and grandchildren can help their grandparents. There is a lot of exchange between generations, and a lot of caring, loving and sharing."

In another talk in the same program, Dr. David Posen, a stress manager and lifestyles counselor, and author of Staying Afloat When the Water Gets Rough: Living in Time of Unprecedented Change, said that although change usually brings stress, there are ways to deal with it.

Above all, he said, we must have a belief in our ability to handle change. "A lot of us have self-limiting beliefs, and these beliefs hold us back. If we believe we can't do something, this belief soon becomes the truth."

We are all change agents, he said. "We have all dealt with change, hardships and adversity. We need to remember that we can handle it."

As well, he said, people should not prejudge the outcome of events. "Many people begin with the premise that things will not work out. We need to remember that things often work out differently than we predicted. We must learn to keep an open mind."

He advised not to take part in "long distance worrying. People often start worrying about something ahead of time, and they get all worked up over it. Life would be much easier if people did not predict problems."

Focus on the positive side of things, he said. "We often cannot choose what is going to happen, but we can choose how we look at things. Try and see change as a challenge. A lot of change brings progress and opportunity. When we solve problems, we come up with new ways of looking at things."

Jewish studies director planning new courses

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"We've more than justified our existence," Michael Brown, the director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, says with a quiet sense of assurance. "We've done our bit to educate Jewishly a lot of people."

Since its formation in 1989, the centre has produced a distinguished roster of rabbis, Jewish day school teachers, community workers and university professors.

In any given year, 700 to 1,000 students are enrolled in the Jewish studies program, taking a vast range of courses running the gamut from history and Hebrew language and literature to classical texts and Sephardic culture.

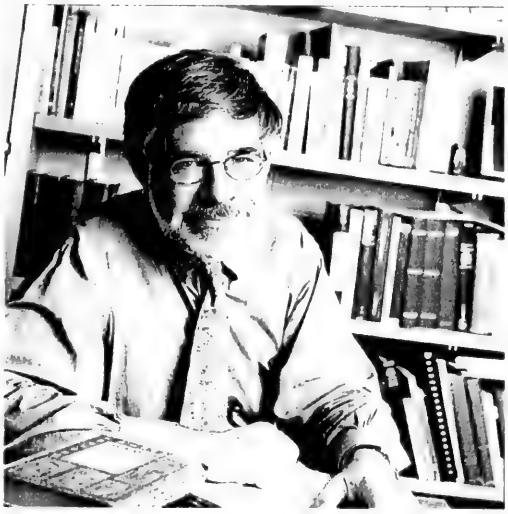
According to Brown, who has led the centre for the past three years, it is particularly strong in Canadiana. Perhaps the major development at the centre this year was the establishment of the J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry, held by historian Irving Abella.

But Brown, an ordained Conservative rabbi who has been associated with York University since 1968, believes that the centre can lay claim to additional strengths.

One example is the Jewish teacher education program, the only one of its kind at a public university outside Israel whose graduates are as much at home in religious as in secular studies.

The program, created almost two decades ago, was launched when there was a pressing need for local Hebrew teachers.

Israeli teachers brought to Canada on three or four year contracts became the norm in many Jewish schools. And while they made useful contributions, they were generally slow to adapt to Canadian conditions, and the frequent turnover caused instability.



Michael Brown

The program, whose existence coincides with the growth of day schools throughout North America, will be enhanced with a chair in Jewish education, which is expected to be set up in about two years.

For all its accomplishments, the centre is hardly resting on its laurels. If Brown has his way, Yiddish language courses will be introduced, there will be more courses in classical Jewish studies, Sephardic studies and Hebrew language, and, eventually, a chair in Holocaust and East European studies will come on stream.

As matters stand now, the centre already has the largest contingent of Canadian exchange students studying at Israeli universities, especially the Hebrew University. This program will likely expand when York University signs an agreement with a yet unnamed university in Israel under which students can spend their summers at archeological digs.

York University's Jewish studies program, founded by Brown and his colleague Sol Tanenzapf in 1968, was one of the first in Canada. McGill, Concordia and the University of Toronto also have extensive, broad-based programs. And other universities, such as the University of Manitoba and the University of British Columbia, offer a variety of courses in the field.

To Brown, a professor of humanities and Hebrew language, this is a remarkable development in Canadian academia.

"Fifty years ago, no one familiar with Canadian higher education could have imagined such openness to Jewish studies," he observes in the recently-published A Guide to the Study of Jewish Civilization in Canadian Universities, the first work to be published by the centre.

"Until well after the war years, prejudiced administrators and faculty members expressed open hostility towards Jews as students and certainly as faculty," he writes. "Those who considered themselves tolerant might welcome Jewish students and perhaps the occasional faculty member. But even they, or most of them, were antagonistic towards, if not contemptuous of, Jewish studies, which they did not consider part of the 'high culture' appropriate to the university curriculum."

In Brown's view, this attitude gradually melted away largely under the impact of the federal government's multicultural policy.

As far as he is concerned, Jewish studies have matured, having forged "an admirable reputation for superior scholarship and academic achievement."

Brown, a graduate of Harvard, Columbia, the Jewish Theological Seminary and the State University of New York, was born in Scranton, Pennsylvania, in 1938, the son of Albert (a fishmonger) and Eunice (a high school teacher). He was raised in "a warm and vital Jewish community."

His family, on both sides, immigrated to the United States in the 1880s from Germany and the Austro-Hungarian and Russian empires.

An only child, he gravitated toward Jewish studies. At Columbia, he wrote his MA thesis in Jewish history on the Hebrew press in America. He studied under the redoubtable Salo Baron, one of this century's finest scholars.

For his PhD, Brown chose a Canadian topic, ultimately turning his dissertation into a book, Jew or Juif? Jews, French Canadians, and Anglo-Canadians, 1759-1914.

A prolific scholar, Brown has also written The Israeli-American Connection: Its Roots in the Yishuv, 1914-1945, Approaches to Anti-semitism: Context and Curriculum and Creating the Jewish Future.

Surveying Canada's Jewish community, Brown speaks of "worrisome trends" from intermarriage to ignorance of Jewish traditions. Yet, he added, there are positive signs on the horizon.

"We have more people studying Judaism at universities – and yeshivot – than at any other time in history, and that's very promising.

"If we're successful, the positive trends will win out."

Post-high school learning centre needed: student

By DAVID ROSMARIN

In North America today, many observant Jews have secluded themselves from other Jews, in an attempt to shelter their children from anti-halachic ideas and to make their daily lives easier. Unfortunately, the result is disassociation from klal Yisrael.

The Jewish community of Toronto is not as internally segregated as most of American Jewry. Today, we find Toronto's Orthodox synagogues filled with Jews of various private religious practice sharing the same prayer service, with respect for each other's differences. Jews of all philosophical and cultural backgrounds come together in Toronto in a uniquely unified fashion.

The greatest monument to the uniqueness of Toronto's Jewish community is the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The school's Statement of Philosophy and Purpose sets the tone, stating that CHAT attempts to build Hebrew textual skills and foster a love for klal Yisrael while being "encouraging of students to assume the observance of mitzvot."

It also states: "The Community Hebrew Academy is guided by the principles of the Toronto Jewish community which seek to cultivate an atmosphere of mutual respect and cooperation among its members, who represent different religious and ideological commitments."

Unfortunately, this inclusionary philosophy towards Jewish education is not found in many other Jewish communities in North America today.

Intra-communal social segregation in the United States leaves many Jews with no place to turn during the period in their lives when religious questions arise. For example, many students at universities across North America may feel unwelcome at shomer mitzvot organizations or may be reluctant to involve themselves for other reasons.

Yet, without a Jewish education, their questions go unanswered, sometimes for life. So many Jews find themselves philosophically lost as a result of a lack of ability to communicate their ideas. All too many feel uncomfortable sharing their questions with others.

These students need a place devoted to halachic practice and to a philosophy of Judaism where they can explore their ideas and questions comfortably and openly.

While "outreach" organizations such as Chabad and Aish HaTorah do fine community work and help countless Jews find answers to their questions within a halachic framework, programs of this sort are primarily aimed at Jews with little or no Jewish education.

But there are a large number of students with a strong Jewish education through grade school, or even high school, who lose their connection to Judaism in their college years. For these students to feel comfortable, a CHAT-like approach to education – an open institution devoted to building Hebrew language and textual skills while encouraging halachic practice and demonstrating concern for all the world's Jews – seems more suitable.

Toronto needs to continue on this unique path that encourages openness, halachic practice and a concern for klal Yisrael.

The key lies in the education of its university students.

At the high school level, CHAT is doing brilliantly; enrolment for the 1998-99 school year was more than 900 students. But a large number of students receive no further Jewish guidance after high school.

There are a number of yeshivot and synagogues in the Toronto area offering shiurim and regular classes. However, many of these institutions' services are not used by a significant number of Toronto's Jewish youth. While halachically observant Jews with a concern for the future of klal Yisrael frequent these establishments, they are not suitable places for all to go to research their questions.

It is becoming apparent that Toronto needs an institution catering to students aged 18 to 25 that promotes enriched Jewish education and a concern for klal Israel in an open and accepting environment.

There are a number of knowledgeable teachers in Toronto high schools who believe in the value of Talmud Torah while retaining a great concern for klal Yisrael. Many of these truly gifted people have developed fine reputations with students teaching at CHAT, Yeshivat Or Chaim, and the Hamilton Yeshiva. These teachers have the opportunity to organize a program designed for 18 to 25-year-old students.

There is a great demand for such a program. There are over 120 male and female Torontonians continuing their Jewish education in Eretz Yisrael this year. Additionally, CHAT alone sends over 100 graduates to universities annually. Many of these students continue their university education in Toronto.

Furthermore, there are countless students without formal Jewish education who have an interest in researching their religious questions in an open environment while building their textual skills. A post-high school learning centre run by the leaders of Jewish education in Toronto today would be a tremendous asset to the city.

David Rosmarin is a student at York University.

Survivor sues France for deporting father

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Canadian Holocaust survivor of French origin recently brought a lawsuit before a French court claiming the French state received goods and property as a result of crimes against humanity.

Jean-Jacques Fraenkel, of Victoria, B.C., accuses the Vichy government of playing an active role in the civil debasement, despoilment and deportation of tens of thousands of Jews during World War II.

The suit has been accepted by the Tribunal de Paris and a magistrate will go through the file by the end of the year before initiating proceedings. This is the first time such a complaint has been filed against the French state.

Fraenkel, 68, is seeking reparation for moral damages and for the material possessions that were stolen from his parents, who were murdered in the the gas chambers of Auschwitz, and from thousands of other Jewish families.

The international business consultant initiated the unprecedented case to show how the government of occupied France made possible the despoilment of his parents, Roger and Jeanine Fraenkel.

"It was France that arrested my parents and delivered them up to the Germans," Fraenkel told The CJN. "It was the zealous civil servants of the French state that stole from my parents all their possessions and assets. Our beautiful apartment in Parc Monceau was sealed up, the furniture and pictures confiscated.

"After the war, the war orphans statute allowed us the grotesque sum of 18.60 francs (about $5) per month until the age of majority. The death of two parents, deported and gassed at Auschwitz, gave us each compensation of about 1,000 francs ($250). Not another centime for my sister Josette and me, orphans of 10 and 14 at the time of liberation.

"France destroyed my family. It's time it shouldered its responsibility and assumed its guilt," Fraenkel said.

France refuses to return the goods and property to the heirs of the despoiled Jewish families, he added.

"The French state is still the owner of all the property that belongs to us – to me and to the other 8,000 to 10,000 descendants of Jewish families deprived of their rights and deported," he said. "The objects confiscated are in museums, the apartment belongs to the city of Paris, and the money is in the coffers of the banks of France."

Fraenkel said he initiated the lawsuit to restore the honor and the dignity of his parents, whose fate he described in his 1997 autobiography, L'abus de confiance.

"The main issue is not money, but justice and the blackened honor of my family. My father was a fervent patriot who always served his country with great loyalty. But France betrayed him and held him in contempt simply because he was a Jew," he said bitterly.

Roger Fraenkel was the first dental surgeon in France and a tenured professor at the dental school of Paris. He was also a justice of the peace of the Paris court, a reserve officer in the French army and a chevalier of the Legion of Honor at age 35.

He was arrested by the French police on April 12, 1941. Interned in the camp of Royaldieu, near Compiègne, he was deported March 27, 1942 on the first train to Auschwitz. He died there under the most horrible conditions on May 20, 1942.

At the same time, two letters arrived at his residence at 3 avenue du parc Monceau. One indicated to this "practitioner of foreign descent" that he was "absolutely forbidden" to practise his profession. The other informed him that he was "removed from the list of reserve officers in the health service."

After Roger Fraenkel's arrest, his wife, Jeanine, became involved in the Resistance, until she was betrayed and also sent to Auschwitz, where she was gassed in 1943.

One of her most dangerous missions against the Nazis was to assess German defences along the Mediterranean coast. With her two children, she took the Nice bus, which followed the coastline, and noted the strategic points on the grid of a crossword puzzle.

After their parents' disappearance, Jean-Jacques and Josette Fraenkel were apart until liberation.

Fraenkel said that, apart from a short interview with Radio Shalom, the Jewish media in France have chosen to ignore his grievances.

He also said he is sorry the presidents of the principal Jewish organizations in France have remained totally silent instead of supporting his suit.

"Most of the presidents of the Jewish institutions did not live through the Shoah. They're afraid of disturbing a dirty past that might embarrass them again. They don't like to be noticed because they're afraid of stirring up anti-Semitism. My fight doesn't interest them at all."

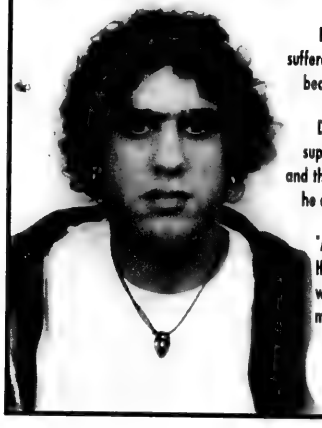
David Sharav. Unwavering Belief



David Sharav was only 21 when, during his first year of army service, he was involved in a horrific car accident. He suffered severe brain damage, memory loss, and after being in a coma for over a week, his right arm was paralyzed. Dudu became deeply depressed during his recovery.

Dudu was referred to the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv for rehabilitation. The staff were able to offer him the support he so desperately needed. Dudu always believed he would get better - and he did. He regained his memory and the use of his arm. Gradually his depression lifted. The recreational therapist persuaded him to start art classes, and he discovered a wonderful talent.

"After my accident, I felt unbelievably isolated. I couldn't do anything for myself, but somehow when I came to Beit Halochem, I felt at home with the other disabled soldiers. When I came to Toronto in 1996 with other disabled war veterans, I felt I was finally on the road to recovery. The warmth and love of the Jewish community made me realize that people really care, and I could make friends and be happy again. Beit Halochem is my lifeline."

Scholars gather in Ottawa for conference on Holocaust

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Scholars from around the world gathered at a recent conference, Building History: Legal Memory and Contemporary Judgments, organized to study various aspects of the Holocaust.

It was jointly sponsored by the Kleinmann Family Foundation of Montreal and the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, in association with the Holocaust Literature Research Institute of the University of Western Ontario, McGill University and the Association of Holocaust Organizations.

The conference was timely, said York University professor Irving Abella at the opening reception, "because not only does it coincide with Holocaust Education Week, Remembrance Day and the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht, but soon, the world will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

The goal of the conference, said Rochelle Wilner, senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, was "to ensure the establishment of the Holocaust in memory as a specific event with universal applications – for human rights, for anti-racism and anti-hate education, and for the pursuit of justice."

Rubin Friedman, director of government relations B'nai Brith Canada, said that "we should do more than put the Holocaust on display. We should take it a step further so that we can learn the appropriate lessons from it. The Holocaust affects all realms of our experience. How do you even talk about it without trivializing it? This is the challenge for all of us."

Peter Kleinmann, president of the Kleinmann Family Foundation, co-sponsored the conference because, "as a Holocaust survivor, he thought that rather than another memorial, he wanted [people to learn]," said Alain Goldschlager of the Holocaust Literature Research Institute, University of Western Ontario.

The book, The Fallacy of Race and the Shoah co-authored by Naomi Kramer, education director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and Ronald Headlance of Vanier College, about the experiences of Kleinmann during the Holocaust, was introduced at the conference.

Plans for Montreal community campus revised

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal Jewish Community Campus has expanded to a nearly $30-million project, $7 million more than when the project was publicly launched one year ago.

Two major features have been added to the original plans: the construction of a fifth floor atop Cummings House and of a 700-seat conference centre, between Cummings House and the Golden Age Association (GAA).

About $3 million remains to be raised and pledges for that amount are expected within the next few months, FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick said at a press conference. He is confident construction will start within the first quarter of 1999 and be completed by the end of that year.

Although the project is bigger and more expensive than first conceived, it is expected to be finished in considerably less time than the 18 months forecast at the outset. That would mean the original target date will be met, even though work is to get underway a year later than scheduled.

The revised project is due to go to final tender in early December, he said. The reason given for construction not beginning last spring as envisaged was that contractors' bids were higher than FEDERATION CJA and the YM-YWHA were prepared to pay.

"Since our announcement last November (1997), the construction of new space has increased by 50 percent, renovated space has increased by a third, the number of parking spaces has increased to 400 (from 300), and advanced technology is being introduced throughout the project, in order to maximize efficiency, security, communications and user friendliness," Plotnick said.

Cummings House and the GAA building on the north side of Cote Ste. Catherine Road, and the Y and Saidye Bronfman Centre to the south will form a "campus," through not only expansion and renovation, but land and streetscaping that give a sense they are part of one whole.

The federal government is contributing $1.3 million to the project, matching earlier grants made by Quebec and Montreal, it was also announced. Martin Cauchon, secretary of state responsible for economic development, said the money is being provided under the Canada-Quebec Infrastructure Works Program.

Apart from the $3.9 million from government, the funds have been raised privately, the great majority from individuals in the Jewish community and the rest from corporations, not necessarily Jewish, Plotnick said.

"In the last 10 days alone, we have raised $3 million from three donors," he said.

The remaining $3 million sought will come mainly from other individuals, he said. In early December FEDERATION CJA will launch a broad-based campaign that will allow people who are not millionaires to contribute even nominal amounts to the campus project. Plotnick said this drive will have a more symbolic than material benefit, but is important because it will give the community at large a sense that it is part of the project.

"Most of all, [the campus] will be the ultimate reaffirmation by the Montreal Jewish community of its commitment to its future in Montreal and the confidence we have for the stability, and hopefully even growth, of our community of just over 101,000 (the 1991 census figure)," he said.

Asked later if he was not apprehensive about a possible Parti Québécois re-election and another referendum, Plotnick said, "We genuinely believe Quebec will remain a part of Canada and will be a great place for the Jewish community to thrive.

"The Jewish community is prepared to make a tangible investment that will show our young people that people of my generation are confident about the future," he said.

When completed, the campus will consist of 500,000 square feet of buildings occupying six acres, housing 23 organizations and 400 mostly underground parking spots.

One original feature that has been dropped is the tunnel under Cote Ste. Catherine, connecting the two sides.

Plotnick said the experts estimated that the tunnel would be used by an average of 100 people per hour and did not feel it would be worth the $1 million it would cost. However, the infrastructure will be in place for its possible construction someday.

He confirmed that Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec, and the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, will be relocating to the campus, as well as the Canadian Zionist Federation and Israel Aliyah Centre, and another major communal organization, which will be made known soon.

Plotnick said the demand from communal agencies to move onto the campus has been overwhelming and others are looking to come on-site.

The conference centre, which will seat more than 700 theatre-style or 500 for dinner, is expected to be a revenue-generator through rentals.

Plotnick underlined that FEDERATION CJA is "firmly committed that no annual local campaign funds will be used for either the construction or the maintenance of any additions."

A large scale-model of the campus was unveiled, which will shortly go on public view at different locations.

Religious group forms

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new religious community has formed around Richard Yaffe, former chazzan of Temple Shalom, the city's only Reform congregation.

Yaffe left the synagogue last February, after 23 years of service, citing unhappiness with contract negotiations.

He led Tikkun, the new congregation, in High Holiday services held at the Masonic Lodge. The services attracted more than 70 people.

"There was a real desire by many of the choir members who had been singing with Richard for all those years, to stay with him," says Debbie Shnitzer, an English professor at the University of Winnipeg, and spokesperson for the new group. "A core group of 15 of us had a couple of meetings, and decided that we wanted to stay together and develop our own type of service with Richard."

Tikkun, at this point, is not planning to hold regular services. Members are planning a Chanukah service which will combine traditional components with education about the holiday. Member participation is encouraged.

"We are still feeling our way," says Schnitzer. "Some of us want to sing together while others want to study or learn Hebrew. We want to move forward and share our voices with the larger community."

Book fair reading features story of Hungarian family

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The 14th annual Jewish Book Fair, held recently at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, showcased Jewish writers from across Canada.

Part of Jewish Book Month, the program included readings, storytelling, musical and theatrical performances, book signings, creative writing workshops, school field trips and a variety of children's programs.

Some of the Lower Mainland authors who took part in the fair were Lillian Boraks-Nemetz, Solly Kaplinski, Philip Resnick and Renee Rodin, while out-of-town writers included Rhea Tregebov, Ronna Bloom and Rafi Aaron.

The fair opened with a wine and cheese reception attended by 200 people, in which Matt Cohen, winner of the 1998 Arts Toronto Literary Award, read from his most recent novel, Last Seen.

Another Toronto writer at the fair was Judith Kalman, author of The County of Birches, a collection of short stories about a Hungarian Jewish family that flees the Hungarian Revolution in 1957 and emigrates to post-war Montreal.

The narrator is a young girl, Dana Weisz, whose parents, both scarred by the Holocaust, live in an imagined golden past that both enchants and frightens Dana and her older sister, Lilli. As Lilli, an enthusiastic student, throws herself into her studies, Dana is left to find a place for herself in the new world of 1960s Montreal.

Story based on author's own life

Kalman said Dana based her life on a fairy tale. "Dana thought nothing bad could possibly happen to her, because, she believed, everything that was bad had happened before she was born, during the war," she explained. "She reassured herself with this fabrication."

After Dana became an adult, however, she looked back at her childhood and began to re-evaluate it. "Then she began to see that she hadn't always been as safe as she thought."

Kalman told The CJN that the stories which make up The County of Birches are based largely on her own family. Born in Budapest, Kalman immigrated with her parents and sister to England in 1957, when she was 3½ years old.

After 18 months in England, the family moved to Canada and settled in Montreal. They lived first in Rosemount, in Montreal's east end, then bought a house in Ville d'Anjou.

Today, Kalman and her husband, Murray Lamb, live with their sons, Nathan, 15, and Gideon, 8, in the North Beaches area of Toronto.

Kalman said she's very pleased at the success of The County of Birches, which is into its third printing.

"It's an immigrant book, not just a Jewish book," she said. "It strikes with a chord with everyone, because of its sense of leaving a homeland and identity behind. 'I was this. What am I now?' Everyone can relate to that feeling."

Identity program announced

JERUSALEM — In an effort to stem the tide of assimilation, and enhance Jewish identity among Jewish people living outside of Israel, Natan Sharansky, minister of industry and trade, and chair of the ministerial committee on Israel-Diaspora relations, and North American Jewish community leaders Michael Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman have announced the establishment of Birthright Israel.

This is a $300-million worldwide initiative to fund educational visits to Israel for Jews between the ages of 15 and 26. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu unveiled the program in remarks before the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations here.

"We are at a critical juncture in the history of the Jewish people, a time when we must do everything possible to strengthen young people's connection to their culture and religion," said Steinhardt, a founding chair of Birthright Israel.

"A strong connection to Israel is a powerful way to bring young Jews back to their roots," he added. "Beginning in the year 2000, all young Jews will be given the opportunity to connect with their heritage like never before.

"Regardless of nationality, economic status or denomination, every Jewish youth will be eligible to participate in a trip that will change their lives. This is a gift from our generation to our children and grandchildren."

The program will be jointly funded by the people of Israel through their government, Jewish federations and community groups, and philanthropists.

"Although Israel is the centre of Jewish life, the heartbeat of the Jewish people, too few of our youth take advantage of the opportunity to experience it," said Bronfman, another founding chair of Birthright Israel. "We believe that such an experience in Israel will create a new commitment to the Jewish community among Jews who live outside of Israel."

After meeting Jewish youth throughout the world, said Sharansky, "I see the strong commitment to the Jewish people among those who visited Israel. I have no doubt that Birthright Israel is the way to build a strong, unified Jewish community for the next millennium."

The Birthright gift will cover the cost of travel to and from Israel and the equivalent of at least 10 days of significant programming, or can serve as a credit toward the cost of a longer program.

Israel, Britain sign agreement

By DOUGLAS DAVIS

LONDON — Israel has reaped a diplomatic benefit from last month's Wye accord.

Just hours after Israel began its further redeployment from the West Bank, and released 250 Palestinian prisoners, Israel and Britain signed a security memorandum to cooperate in defence research.

Britain's ambassador to Israel said the memorandum resulted from the Oct. 23 signing of the Wye agreement at the White House.

The memorandum calls for enhanced joint weapons research and facilitating information exchanges.

Two areas that are likely to benefit directly from the agreement are the fields of naval high-tech and pilotless surveillance drones.

Joint nuclear research is excluded from the pact.

This is the first such memorandum of understanding between Britain and a non-NATO member state.

In a call to Israel's ambassador to London and a senior British Defence Ministry official, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed his satisfaction at the signing of the memorandum

He described the memorandum as a "positive development" that he hoped "will serve as a foundation for future relations."

Netanyahu is visiting London this week for meetings with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and foreign secretary Robin Cook.

GA comes to an end

More than 5,000 people attended the conference whose theme was Many People, Many Roads, One Heart. Approximately 3,500 delegates were from North America; 260 were Canadians. Some 1,500 Israelis also took part. The large numbers of participants from both sides of the Atlantic Ocean in effect converted the proceedings to an intense four-day cultural exchange between the two groups: North Americans and Israelis.

The assembly was opened Monday night with the hope expressed to the delegates by Charles Bronfman, international chair of the GA, that they would get to know each other, "to celebrate the common histories and common heritage.

Echoing Bronfman's call, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu urged delegates "to feel the bond that all Jews must feel when they walk the streets and the paths of Jerusalem."

Organizers and planners of the conference arranged programs for the delegates designed to increase opportunities for mutual discovery. Person to person contact was the norm.

Activities centered on constant face to face exchanges of views and opinions in settings that ranged from small panels and larger forums, to full plenaries.

In a further departure from past practice, on one of the days, delegates travelled to different parts of the country on field trips, each of which explored a subject of the delegate's own choosing.

The final day of the conference saw nearly 30 Knesset members join delegates in concurrent discussions of critical issues facing Israelis and North American Jews as individuals and as a community. The day concluded with an emotional signing of the Covenant of the Jewish People, a document confirming the intention of the communities to strengthen and maintain Jewish unity worldwide.

It became clear early on in the assembly that North American and Israeli perceptions of each other were often at odds with reality. Discussions on a number of topics, such as fundraising, social priorities, the peace process, religious pluralism, and national identity versus religious or ethic identity, spilled out of the conference rooms and into the halls and dining areas of the conference centre throughout the week.

Poland to return billions in Jewish property

By ALEX SOMEKH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) and the heads of the Jewish community in Poland have struck a deal to have the Polish government return some $3 billion (US) in Jewish property grabbed by the Nazis.

The deal, signed earlier this month, includes thousands of buildings and land, taken by the Nazis and then appropriated by the government after World War II. The land is now being used by the Polish army, government ministries and schools.

The ownership will be divided equally into three portions, one to the WJRO, one to the Polish Jewish community, and one-third to organizations to be selected in negotiations between the WJRO and the Polish Jewish community.

An Israeli source said that some of the property will eventually end up in Israeli government hands, with the government involved in the talks.

Meanwhile, in the last few weeks, deals have been struck in two other countries – Romania and Hungary. The Romanian government is to hand over 11 buildings, worth some $2.5 million to the WJRO and the local Jewish community, who will divide the property equally.

In Hungary, the deal involved the local Jewish organizations forgoing their demands for some 153 buildings currently in use by the Hungarian government and military, as well as medical clinics and old-age homes, in exchange for an annual payment of $3 million to the local Jewish community. No time frame has been put on that annual payment.

A source involved in the negotiations said that the motivation for a quick deal in all three countries was the belief that Jewish organizations could interfere with attempts to get those countries their entry tickets to NATO. Elsewhere, negotiations continue with the Bulgarian and Slovakian governments.

The WJRO had its annual general meeting in Jerusalem to discuss what to do with the $1.25 billion that is due from the deal made with Swiss banks three months ago. The decision makers – including the chiefs of the World Jewish Congress and the Jewish Agency – must abide by criteria that will be eventually approved by a federal court in New York.

The decision has already been made to allocate some 20 percent of the money for education and memorials, with money to go to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Museum in Washington, the Lohamei Hagetaot Holocaust research centre, and the Jewish Agency.

Settlers, PA slam Israel over Wye

In the redeployment, Israel transferred two percent of the West Bank, or some 44 square miles, from sole Israeli control to joint control with the Palestinian Authority. Israel also handed over 7.1 percent of land in the region to sole Palestinian control.

Most of the redeployment was carried out near the West Bank town of Jenin. The second redeployment called for in the Wye accord will be centred around Ramallah and the third around Hebron. All three redeployments, which are linked to Palestinian steps to live up to security commitments, are scheduled to be completed by January.

Along with the redeployment, Israel carried out the prisoner release, which led the Palestinian Authority to complain that 150 of the 250 people freed were common criminals and that the Wye agreement stated all should be political prisoners.

"We did not seek U.S. President Bill Clinton's guarantees in order to secure the release of car thieves," Dr. Ahmed Tibi, an adviser to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, told Israel Radio.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu denied that he had violated the Wye agreement. His position was upheld by a U.S. Embassy spokesperson, who said in a statement that the United States was unaware of any violation of the accord regarding the releases.

Despite the prisoner dispute, celebrations were held over the weekend in the West Bank towns that became part of the self-rule areas.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 16

• Yasser Arafat hinted that Palestinians would not hesitate to use violence if the United States and Israel "delay us from praying at Al-Aksa," referring to the mosque in Jerusalem. A spokesperson for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Arafat's comments, broadcast over the Voice of Palestine, were a "declaration of war on the peace process."

Nov. 17

• The army began closing gas mask distribution centres that were opened at the start of the latest crisis with Iraq. Some 65 stations were opened earlier to hand out and update civil defence kits in case Iraq bombed Israel. Officials said the public appeared unconcerned with the tensions, saying only some 26,000 people came to the centres.

• Two Israelis accused of spying on Cyprus made several telephone calls to an intelligence service in Tel Aviv just before they were arrested, according to testimony in a Cypriot court. Israel has denied that the two men, who were arrested earlier this month, were working against Cyprus or on behalf of Turkey.

Nov. 18

• Israel invited bids for the construction of 1,025 housing units at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem. The step was viewed as an effort by Netanyahu to placate domestic opposition after the cabinet approved the Wye agreement.

• A bill to cancel Israel's law for the direct election of the prime minister is expected to pass a first vote when it is soon brought before the Knesset.

Nov. 19

• Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman proposed legislation to protect Israeli renters from sharp swings in the shekel's exchange rate with the U.S. dollar. Rents in Israel are quoted in dollars but paid in shekels. The recent decline in the shekel against the dollar has driven up rental costs.

Nov. 20

• A law that would require Israeli radio stations to devote at least half of their music air time to Israeli songs passed the first of three Knesset votes.

Knesset opposition helps get Wye accord ratified

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has won a major Knesset vote, thanks to the opposition.

Far from receiving applause for his victory, Netanyahu faced growing calls to form a national unity government or go to early elections, after most of the legislators who voted against the Wye accord were members of Netanyahu's own governing coalition.

While the Knesset approved the accord by 75-19 with nine abstentions, most of the support came from the opposition Labor party.

Two of Netanyahu's ministers from the National Religious Party voted against the accord. Seven other ministers, five of them from Netanyahu's Likud party, absented themselves from the Knesset floor when the vote was taken.

Governing coalition

Among those calling on Netanyahu to change his government or seek early elections was legislator Aryeh Deri, a member of the Orthodox Shas party, which is part of the governing coalition.

"The prime minister should come out in a public call, out in the open, not in back-room dealings, to [opposition leader] Ehud Barak and his colleagues to join a national unity government," Deri said.

"If not, the prime minister has to go to the people and say, 'I did the best I could,' and go to elections," he told Israel Radio. "I don't think that the coalition can function as it is, just as Ehud Barak knows he can't bring down the government."

For his part, Barak downplayed the idea of joining a national unity government.

But at the same time, he pledged the Labor party's continued support for the Wye accord – "even if no cabinet ministers support it."

Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom, a member of the NRP, defended his decision to vote against the Wye agreement, even though it constituted a vote of no-confidence in the government.

Referring to an earlier decision by the NRP central committee to defer for at least six weeks any support for a bill to call for early elections, he said that if Netanyahu continues to call on the Palestinians to live up to their part of the accord, "I will propose staying in the current government, which is still a bad alternative, but better than all the others."

Coalition chair Meir Sheetrit took a less sympathetic view of Yahalom's stand.

He and Labor legislator Avraham Shochat submitted a joint motion that any cabinet member who votes no confidence in the government be immediately ousted from his position.

Knesset ratification of the Wye accord came only days after the two parties to the peace process renewed their war of words.

Statements by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat threatening to use violence against Israel, and by Israeli foreign minster Ariel Sharon exhorting settlers to grab more West Bank land, revealed deeper problems that both sides will face.

Even if the Wye accord is implemented, these problems are likely to resurface in the final-status negotiations.

The accord, which ended a 19-month stalemate in the peace process, was expected to usher in a new period of Israeli-Palestinian cooperation.

And in an effort to restore some spirit of cooperation, Arafat reiterated his commitment to the peace process at a news conference in Jericho last week.

"We are protective of the peace process in the Middle East and all the peace agreements we signed with the Israelis," Arafat said. "Peace is a Palestinian strategic choice, and any differences in the final-status negotiations, we stress that we want them to be solved by peaceful means through negotiations, and not in any other way."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Arafat's remarks a "positive development. From my perspective, an important obstacle was overcome."

The obstacle emerged earlier when Arafat, addressing a gathering of Fatah members in the West Bank town of Ramallah, reiterated his intention to declare Palestinian statehood next May.

In addition, Arafat told the Fatah members, "Our rifles are ready, and we are prepared to use them against whoever tries to prevent us from praying in Jerusalem."

Reacting to Arafat's comments, Netanyahu announced, just as the Knesset began debating the Wye agreement, that he was suspending a West Bank redeployment slated for earlier this month. Palestinian officials charged that Netanyahu had misunderstood Arafat's remarks and that the self-rule authority remains committed to its decision to pursue peace.

"He did not mean guns in the literal sense," Palestinian official Ziad Abu Ziad told Israel Radio. "He was talking about Palestinian rights to Jerusalem."

Meanwhile, Dr. Ahmed Tibi, an adviser to Arafat, charged Israel with contributing to the inflammatory atmosphere.

Tibi cited comments made by Sharon, who said Jewish settlers should grab as much West Bank land as they can to keep it from the Palestinians.

"Whatever is seized will be ours. Whatever isn't seized will be in their hands," said the hawkish Sharon, who championed Jewish settlement in areas captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

Sharon had warned that if the peace process continues to deteriorate, a free-for-all would develop in which the West Bank would be up for grabs.

Further inflaming Israeli-Palestinian tensions was the announcement last week that Israel was inviting bids for the construction of 1,025 housing units at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem.

American officials have their hands full with what looks like two less-than-willing partners to the peace process.

Israel maintains air advantage

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Israel has maintained a decisive technological advantage in the air with the acquisition of its latest strike aircraft from the United States, according to the current issue of the London-based Jane's Defence Weekly.

The journal reports that the Israel Air Force has now taken delivery of more than half of the 25 Boeing F-15I jet fighters it ordered in 1994, and has already conducted more than 1,200 flights with the aircraft, which are now stationed at the Tel Nov base in central Israel.

The multi-billion-dollar order, scheduled to be completed by mid-1999, gives Israel – for the first time – an all-weather, long-range, preemptive strike capability, the journal reported.

The acquisition also gives Israel "the most powerful long-range aircraft in the region," it said.

An Israeli defence official was quoted as saying that a decision on Israel's next aircraft purchase is not expected until early next year.

ROM exhibit features look at Rothschilds

Cartoon of Nathan Rothschild (right of centre) and his wife promenading in Brighton, 1826.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Rothschilds, the legendary and luminous Jewish family which emerged from the darkness of the 18th century Frankfurt ghetto, are synonymous with fame and fortune.

Their name conjurs up visions of fabulous wealth, palatial country estates and grand vineyards.

Two hundred years after the founder of the clan, Mayer Amschel Rothschild, began trading in precious coins and medals, the Rothschilds appear to be as powerful and influential as ever.

The allure of the Rothschilds is such that a litany of books and movies have chronicled their financial acumen and their integral role in the development of the modern banking system and the global economy.

Joining the bandwagon, the Royal Ontario Museum has opened a new multi-media exhibit about them. Entitled Two Rothschild Centuries: The Remarkable Life and Achievements of Nathan Mayer Rothschild and His Descendants, it runs until Jan. 31, 1999.

Consisting of videos, photographs, artifacts, documents and keepsakes, this rather modest, somewhat superficial exhibit revolves around Nathan Mayer (1777-1836), one of the family's most stellar figures.

An innovative entrepreneur, Nathan Mayer settled in Britain when he was only 21. Overcoming barriers of language, culture and religion, he transformed himself into a leading Manchester businessmen. Later, having established himself in London as a banker, he married Hannah Cohen, the dark-eyed daughter of a well-connected merchant.

Without a doubt, Rothschild's greatest triumph was in financing Britain's war against Napoleonic France. "That was the best business I ever did," he gloated in what must have been an unguarded moment.

The object of sardonic cartoonists, some of whose works adorn this exhibit, Nathan Mayer was in the forefront of the industrialization of Europe.

He and his brothers, who set up branches of N.M. Rothschild and Sons throughout Europe and whose lives are duly noted, were instrumental in building railways, bridges, tunnels and canals and in developing oil fields in southern Russia.

Their children, having been groomed for leadership positions, did not rest on the family's laurels. In 1858, Lionel de Rothschild was the first Jew to become a member of Britain's House of Commons. In 1875, thanks to N.M. Rothschild and Sons, Britain was able to buy up shares of the Suez Canal, an act which irretrievably altered the balance of power in the Middle East.

Aside from a passing reference to the family's vineyard in Rosh Pina, Israel, no mention whatsoever is made of their direct involvement in Britain's 1917 Balfour Declaration. It is an egregious oversight, but not an unexpected one given the physical smallness of the exhibit. In terms of size and quality, it is certainly not as impressive as the 1994 Rothschild exhibit in Frankfurt.

However, because of its Canadian venue, unusually close attention is paid to Rothschild projects in Canada.

In the early 1950s, they were part of a consortium to develop 50,000 square miles of territory in Newfoundland. And after opening an office in Toronto in 1989, the Rothschilds never looked back.

Among other ventures, N.M. Rothschild advised the Nova Scotian government on the $851 million privatization of the Nova Scotia Power Corporation and the Royal Bank of Canada's $1.7 billion acquisition of Royal Trust.

In addition, the Rothschilds were called in as consultants on the financing of Prince Edward Island's Confederation Bridge and on Rogers' alliance with AT&T.

Today, with offices in almost 40 countries, N.M. Rothschild is a thriving global operation, a world-wide enterprise of which Nathan Mayer surely would have been proud.

One wonders, though, how he would have reacted to the assimilatory impulses of his descendants. A family tree, which takes the Rothschilds up to the present, is testimony to the fact that mixed marriages seem to have become the norm among the redoubtable Rothschilds.

Schwarz is the executive producer at Jams Productions, which recently commenced preproduction for the new half-hour live-action children's television show.

"When my grandchildren were very young," said the professional Bubbie, "I wrote poems about Higgly, Wiggly, Wonkers and Snout, and then I started writing short stories about the various adventures that the piglets experienced.

"The piglets share those experiences with several other recurring characters, including Poncho the Head Honcho, Calfy Calf, Kitty Kat and Bossy Cow."

In the Spotlight: Toronto producer-director Ric Bienstock has been taking a hard look at the hardcore pornography industry for an upcoming six-part television series, Sexual Century, about modern attitudes to sex.

"During the sexual revolution of the 1960s, sex was all about free love," notes the Montreal-born Bienstock, who has lived in Toronto the last 12 years. "Now sex is all about capitalism and making money. There are a lot of mainstream companies profiting from the adult industry.

"Every major hotel chain offers porn in their rooms. That's a big transition. How did it come to be that hotels offer pornography to their guests?"

Bienstock won Geminis last year for her work in the documentary, Ebola: Inside An Outbreak, and in 1996 for Ms Conceptions, a documentary about single mothers by choice. She also worked on The Plague Monkeys and Deadly Currents for the Toronto-based Associated Producers.

Bienstock's segment of Sexual Century is in final post-production stages. The series is due for airing in the winter, first on the History Channel, then on CBC in Canada and ITV in England.

Aging boomers dig Diamond

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Centre ice was transformed into a flashy revolving stage for Neil Diamond's recent Toronto concert, a bigtime nostalgia test for aging boomers and a number of younger fans.

The crowd of 17,000 spent much of the two-hour show at Maple Leaf Gardens on their feet, swaying, clapping and singing along to the familiar ballads of the 57-year-old pop star/songwriter, accompanied by his nine-piece band. Subsequent to the Nov. 15 appearance in Toronto, he played Hamilton's Copps Coliseum, Ottawa's Corel Centre and Montreal's Molson Centre.

Two couples slow-danced in an aisle near the Toronto stage as Diamond sang I've Been This Way Before from his 1974 Serenade album.

When he began Song Sung Blue in a voice as powerful, deep and sure as when he recorded it in the early '70s, I was transported to a different arena – a suburban rink where I skated with friends in high school.

Cracklin' Rosie took me back in a different way, evoking unexpected tears at the memory of a high school friend, now deceased, who got a charge out of any song with her name in it.

As far as the rest of the sold-out house was concerned, Diamond could barely begin any of his oldies – songs like Love On The Rocks, Hello Again and Shilo – before thunderous cheering erupted again.

Onstage, Diamond is extravagant with his blown kisses and Klezmerist sketches deeply meditative soundscape

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Those who attended Andy Statman's recent performance at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts know why the diminutive New Yorker has been a major contributor to the klezmer revival of the past quarter century.

Through a breathtaking combination of virtuosity, spirituality and sheer inventiveness, Statman captivated and often surprised the generally appreciative audience with a set featuring music from his latest CD, The Hidden Light.

Statman's latest musical ventures have taken him into uncharted waters, where he has practically invented a new hybrid form of music. "KlezTrane" might be an apt description of this latest fusion, which combines the mournful old-world melodies of klezmer music with the deeply textured, free-form improvisation of modern jazz. Whatever one calls it, it represents a significant new direction in Jewish music.

Two decades ago, before the term klezmer had begun to reappear in the contemporary lexicon, Statman was one of a mere handful of musicologists and musicians rediscovering the music of their Jewish forebears.

Statman and his fellow revivalists (Henry Sapoznik, Zev Feldman, Hankus Netsky, and others) emphasized "authenticity" and attention to detail in their early recordings.

Through copious study of old 78rpm records and field recordings (and in Statman's case, apprenticeship with the legendary klezmer clarinetist Dave Tarras), the early revivalists brought klezmer music back to life by trying to recreate the sounds of the early 20th-century klezmorim, replicating the original instrumentations and mimicking every nuance of the source recordings.

But after helping establish familiarity with the old style as a guiding principle of the revival, Statman soon embarked on an evolutionary course. He experimented with non-traditional instrumentation and allowed his background in bluegrass, jazz and other ethnic folk music to seep in. His music continued to evolve, eventually culminating in his most recent and boldest departure.

Backed by a trio of piano, bass, and drums, Statman's current sound is underpinned by a lush ambience of constantly shifting chordal and rhythmic textures.

While the band provides a spacious canvas, Statman sketches impressionistic masterpieces on the clarinet and the mandolin, using traditional and contemporary Jewish melodies as a point of departure. The result is a deeply meditative soundscape unlike anything else in modern Jewish music or jazz.

For some, this new sound is hard to grasp, perhaps a little too diffuse and introspective, and certainly nothing like what many people believe klezmer music is "supposed to sound like." Indeed, a handful of patrons at last week's concert filed for the exits at intermission and before the encore, obviously disappointed that Statman never gave them cause to clap their hands, dance in the aisles and sing along.

Those who expect a certain sound when they hear the word klezmer will find it difficult to get past preconceived notions when listening to Statman. But reducing klezmer to a self-parodic caricature of freilech, sentimental Yiddish theatre tunes does injustice to a musical tradition that was, and is, much broader and more complex.

Evolution and fusion with other musical styles has always been a central feature of klezmer music, in Europe and in America, in this century and the last. Those who dismiss Statman with the oft-heard protest, "but that's not klezmer," fail to understand that klezmer music has always been a dynamic form, changing to adapt to contemporary styles and to meet the needs of uprooted communities and an ever-changing sense of Jewish identity.

Moreover, they fail to grasp the consequences of the fact that the community that nurtured the growth of klezmer music from the Middle Ages to the World War II no longer exists. For klezmer music to survive in any manner, it must be allowed to evolve, it must be treated as a living tradition, rather than a static one fixed somewhere in time between this century's two great wars.

Statman is not alone on the cutting edge of Jewish music. He is joined by other contemporary musicians whose mastery of the old style but willingness to evolve is ensuring the survival and growth of music coming out of the klezmer tradition. Foremost among these musicians is the international group Brave Old World, who take a radically different approach than Statman, but also create an awe-inspiring, thoroughly original new form of music based firmly on the klezmer style.

Other acts, including Boston's Naftule's Dream, New York's Klezmatics, and Canada's own Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, are also developing their own languages of improvisation based on klezmer, as well as on jazz and various types of world music.

A mere generation ago or two ago, klezmer music was to all intents and purposes, dead. Today it is once again a thriving and dynamic form, thanks in no small part to the work of artists like Statman.

But in order for it to continue to grow, the innovations of today's klezmorim must be recognized, not as adulterations of a once-great form, but rather as evolutions of a lasting and flexible musical language, a language able to express the deepest passions, sorrows and joys of the Jewish soul – past, present…and future.

sweeping arm movements, but stingy with his spoken words. The Brooklyn native offered an uncharacteristically personal intro, however, to the song America, which he wrote for the movie The Jazz Singer, in which he also starred.

Diamond's immigrant grandparents had entered the United States "with only dreams and prayers and hopes for the future," he said.

His superstar persona underscored the contrast to his words, as it did when he invited the audience to join him in a rousing sing-along version of Forever In Blue Jeans, wearing black dress pants and a spangly red shirt, the back of which was sweat-soaked due to the intensity he put into every number.

The most kitschy moment of the evening came during the song America, as two American and two Canadian flags unfurled to the lyrics, "My country 'tis of thee." It was a rare use of gimmickry in a show that focused almost exclusively on Diamond's music.

There were, of course, selections from his recently released 44th album. In addition to the title song of the double CD, entitled The Movie Album: As Time Goes By, Diamond sang Unchained Melody, Frank Sinatra's I've Got You Under My Skin and a melodramatic version of Elvis Presley's I Can't Help Falling In Love With You.

Melodrama aside, it's a good bet the three fans who held up signs with the words "Love Ya Neil," were speaking for the whole audience.

TRAVEL TALK

NEW YEAR'S EVE "DIG" AT EIN GEDI

Looking for an unusual way to bring in the secular new year? Volunteers are required to work on a thrilling excavation of a Roman-Byzantine village at Ein Gedi, along the Dead Sea. The dig is scheduled for Dec. 27 to Jan. 20, under the leadership of Dr. Yizhar Hirschfeld, in a program jointly sponsored by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the University of Hartford, Connecticut.

Ein Gedi, situated about 50 miles southeast of Jerusalem and 12 miles north of Masada, is a lush and exotic oasis in the Negev Desert, with high rocky cliffs, a pounding waterfall, a nature reserve graced with tropical flora, and a kibbutz-like garden village.

It was near Ein Gedi that the young David hid from the wrath of King Saul (I Samuel 24) some 3,000 years ago.

Excavation began in the early 1970s, when a series of sixth-century synagogues and a splendid zodiac mosaic floor were unearthed.

Volunteers recently uncovered an entire section of this isolated ancient community – a street, the entrance to the village, multi-storied homes, shops, a ritual bath and many small treasures such as coins, pottery lamps, cloth, jewelry and glass.

In the fourth century the village was inhabited by members of the mystical-ascetic Essenes sect, who produced an expensive, aromatic oil called balsam. The current phase of work is focused on unravelling the secret of production of this valuable oil.

Volunteers should be prepared to dig, pick, sift, wash and sort from early morning to early afternoon, five days a week; On weekends they are free to relax and travel. Lectures about the site and the excavation, as well as field trips into the surrounding desert area, are part of the experience.

No prior knowledge or background is required but every volunteer must be energetic, in good physical health, and of good cheer. Minimum stay is one week. Room and full board cost between $180 to $300 US per week, depending on the accommodation chosen.

To register, contact Dr. Y. Hirschfeld, Institute of Archaeology, Hebrew University, Mt. Scopus, 91905 Jerusalem. Fax 011-972-2-582-5548. email [hani@ actcom.co.il], Web site, [www.hum.huji.ac.il/archaeology/eingedi/]. Deadline is Dec. 15.

Polish Journal: Montreal writer Irena Karafilly went back to her native Poland after an absence of some 40 years, keen on understanding the turbulent past and complex present of Polish society. Travelling through diverse regions, she met people from all walks of life, from priest to prostitute, and explored Tatar villages, Teutonic Knights' castles, even a jail and a concentration camp.

Karafilly, whose father is Jewish, also visited his shtetl and discovered the manner of her grandparents' deaths. She recounts the highly personalized story of her travels in Ashes and Miracles: A Polish Journey (Malcolm Lester Books, $21.95).

Views of London & Paris: Two recent travel guidebooks give very distinctive views of these two world capitals.

Impressionist Paris: The Essential Guide to the City of Light outlines a series of 30 walks in and around Paris pertaining to the lives of famous impressionist painters such as Cezanne, Degas, Manet, Monet, Renoir, Pissarro and Seurat.

Author Julian More goes so far as to point out details from the streetscape that can be found in these artists' celebrated canvases. The book is published by Pavilion in Great Britain and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books. It sells for $42.95.

Who Lies Where: A Guide to Famous Graves, by Michael Kerrigan, provides details on the final resting places of hundreds of historic personages throughout Britain – including Diana. "It is ironic that the world's first postmodern princess should have a send-off which recalled in scale and emotion the great public funerals of the nineteenth century," writes Kerrigan in this interesting, albeit somewhat eccentric, county-by-county guide. (Fourth Estate; distributed by Raincoast Books; $21.95.)

Pamper Yourself: the Laromme Jerusalem Hotel has introduced the Pamper Package, a special program that runs through most of the winter. Under this program, rooms are $69.50 (US) per person per night, excluding service charge but including breakfast and use of the swimming pool and spa.

For $50 more, guests may be upgraded to a deluxe room with a large terrace and magnificent view. 3 Jabotinski St., Jerusalem. Phone 02-6756-666, fax 02-6756-777.

Shalom Y'All to the Triangle

By LEWIS ERIC LACHTER
Special to The CJN

RALEIGH, N.C. — There are many reasons why Jewish residents and lots of tourists are attracted to the the three cities that make up the "Triangle" area of North Carolina: Raleigh, Durham and Chapel Hill.

Let's start with the Jewish community in Raleigh. The umbrella organization for the community is the Wake County Jewish Federation on Creedmore Road.

The JCC is located on six hectares of beautiful park. In addition to the main building, there is a large swimming pool, a playground, a snack bar, a lake for boating and fishing, an outdoor amphitheatre, covered basketball courts, and soccer and baseball fields.

There are two Reform congregations in Greater Raleigh: Temple Beth Or, an established synagogue with a wide range of religious, educational, social and cultural activities; and Beth Shalom, a newer congregation. The Conservative shul is Beth Meyer, which calls itself "a warm and informal congregation." The Lubavitch synagogue, Congregation Sha'arei Israel, is traditional, and says in its literature that "no previous knowledge of Hebrew is needed for participation."

Moving along the Triangle to the Durham-Chapel Hill Jewish Federation, you'll find a vibrant, fast-growing organization and community. Located on Lyckan Parkway in Durham, the federation publishes the Menorah, a newspaper that carries news, views and a complete calendar of local events.

The federation also publishes the Shalom Y'All Directory, "the somehow never complete, constantly being revised directory of shuls, schools, organizations and more."

There are three synagogues in Durham. The Judea Reform Congregation, which was formed in 1961, has a membership of some 500 families. Beth El Synagogue describes itself as both Conservative and Orthodox; and Congregation Ohr Torah of the Jewish Learning Experience is Orthodox.

The newly formed Chapel Hill Kehilla is the first congregation in Chapel Hill. At this time, Shabbat services are held twice monthly at Hillel on the campus of the University of North Carolina.

Just eight miles from Chapel Hill is lovely Chatham County. In addition to the large number of artists' studios, be sure to stop at the Village of Fearrington. You'll find beautiful gardens, walking trails and fascinating shops, including a great book store.

Researchers study Baycrest patients' brain processes

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The brain processes of aged patients at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care are revealing secrets that are of help to researchers.

Though one man cannot pronounce or recognize the word apple, he chose a red apple over one painted blue for the experiment, said Dr. Guy Proulx, Baycrest's director of psychology.

Another patient could not recognize any shape, but left the interview room and walked down a corridor without stumbling.

"These secrets come from places we least expect," Proulx told those attending the second lecture in the Ada Starkman series at Abe Posluns Auditorium.

He joined Vivienne Marcus, curator of the $4 million art collection at Baycrest, in describing how visual stimuli help cognitive processes.

When eight people, including his two daughters and spouse, walked by a patient, Dr. Proulx said, there was no sign of recognition. But a galvanic skin response detector (sometimes known as a lie detector) clearly showed that the patient did recognize his spouse and daughters.

Proulx said he had a yellow painting in his office that he did not particularly like, until a patient saw it and exclaimed, "Oh, the sun."

"Then I realized what the painting was about. I think the patients here are less confused about art, than are the professionals on staff."

One patient, a former veterinarian, has Parkinson's disease, and is losing his eyesight, but he still paints in vivid colors, said Proulx.

"When his hand grasps the paint brush and his arm is extended, he has no tremor. That is much better for him than a gadzillion doses of medicine."

At age 30, he said, people begin to lose their ability to recognize names and faces without cues, but a research study showed that once these cues are provided the aged do very well.

Proulx told of a man with praxia (paralysis of one side of the body) who could not smile when told to do so. But when shown a partly toothless comb (Proulx is bald) the patient broke out in a full smile, showing all his teeth.

In a drab environment, patients cannot recognize clues, Proulx said, praising the art on Baycrest's walls, all of which has been donated.

"I am stunned by the incredible quality of art at Baycrest," said Glen Cummings, a member of its art comittee.

Marcus conducted a tour of the institute's art.

The lecture and tour were sponsored by the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

Screening urged for Ashkenazim

NEW YORK — Ashkenazi Jews should undergo carrier screening for Canavan disease (CD), a fatal genetic childhood disease with no known cure, the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (ACOG) recommended recently.

As with Tay-Sachs disease, the Ashkenazi Jewish community is at highest risk. Since both Tay-Sachs and CD are more common among this population, ACOG recommends screening if both partners are Ashkenazi Jews.

Carrier screening requires only a small blood sample for DNA analysis. The CD gene was discovered in 1993.

Most parents begin to recognize problems in their infant's development between 3 and 6 months of age. One of the earliest signs of CD is low overall muscle tone and lack of head control.

As the child grows, motor skills and mental ability progress very little or deteriorate, and speech never develops. Hearing remains sharp, but blindness can occur from optic nerve atrophy. Weakness of the muscles, seizures and severe feeding problems develop, and many children with the disease do not live to adolescence.

CD, like Tay-Sachs, is inherited as an autosomal recessive trait – both parents must be carriers of an altered CD gene for a child to inherit the disorder. A parent who is a carrier is healthy, because he or she has one functional copy of the gene, which produces a sufficient amount of the necessary enzyme aspartoacylase.

The enzyme helps control the over-accumulation of N-acetyl-aspartic acid, which in excess leads to the destruction of myelin in the brain. Myelin is a key component of the nervous system which protects nerves and allows messages to be sent to and from the brain.

"When both parents are carriers for CD, there is a one-in-four chance with each pregnancy that their child will receive two altered copies of the CD gene and have CD," said Judith Tsipis, director of the genetic counselling training program at Brandeis University.

"Even though an Ashkenazi Jewish couple has no family history of CD, and may already have one or more healthy children, they still may be at risk of having a child with CD. Only carrier testing can tell them for sure," Tsipis said.

Carrier testing can be done during pregnancy. If both parents turn out to be carriers, prenatal diagnosis for CD is available.

More information about the disease and a list of testing sites is available through the Canavan Foundation, 600 West 111th St., New York, N.Y., 10025; or on the Internet at [www.canavanfoundation org]. Phone 212-316-6488 or fax 212-665-4788.

Jason Sherman won a Governor General's award in 1995.

Sherman's new play based on a 1930s 'labor opera'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although his current play It's All True is based on a "labor opera" from the 1930s, and though many of his previous plays have been highly critical of Israel, Toronto playwright Jason Sherman told an audience at Harbourfront recently, "I don't think of myself as a political playwright any more than I do a Jewish playwright."

The 36-year-old York University graduate, whose play Three In The Back, Two In The Head won a Governor General's award for drama in 1995, has nonetheless produced several plays that explore issues of Jewish identity and the Jewish state. And there are likely to be more, he said during a public interview.

In The League of Nathans, which was first performed in 1992, "three Jewish guys talk about life and Israel," Sherman said. "On the surface it was a very political piece, and there was a wide range of opinion about it in the Jewish press because it seemed to attack the very underpinnings of Zionism."

Reading Hebron, first performed in 1997, "went a little further. But I don't know if I should have a business card that says, 'Jason Sherman, political playwright.'"

Sherman has also produced a dramatized version of the non-fiction work None Is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper, which focused on Canada's restrictive anti-Semitic immigration policies before and during World War II.

"I think that theatre has a very practical role to play in slowly changing people's minds, and challenging people to change their beliefs."

The author of a weekly dramatic segment for the CBC radio program This Morning, Sherman acknowledged that one of his least political plays, Patience, "has received the most attention outside Toronto." The play concerns the Job-like tribulations of a successful man who suddenly loses his family and business. It's currently under option by a Hollywood studio, which is paying royalties for the privilege.

"It's a political play, just not overtly so," Sherman said. "I was trying to write a play that doesn't deal on the surface with politics, and see what happens. And what happened is, it was a big hit. I don't know what the lesson is in that because I don't want to stop doing plays like League of Nathans. In the end, I'll probably end up somewhere in the middle."

In both League of Nathans and Reading Hebron, Sherman utilizes a character named Nathan Abramowitz – and he apparently plans to use him again for the final instalment of what will become a trilogy. Asked if Nathan Abramowitz is his alter ego, Sherman replied, "Absolutely. He's my way of putting myself in my work. And he's going to go to Israel...I've got to get there myself."

Sherman didn't meet an actor or director until he was in his third year of York's playwrighting program, he said. "After I left university, I discovered that the best way to write plays is to start revising and rewriting right away. Otherwise, what you're handing in are perfect plays that work only in your mind. It's an art form that needs to be spoken aloud."

The Montreal-born writer was interviewed by Andrea Curtis, editor of This Magazine. Later, he took questions from the audience. One questioner noted his "flip" attitude and his frequent humorous asides.

"I have seven brothers, and one of the rites of passage was to make the others laugh," he explained. "Until you did that you were not a man, even if you had a bar mitzvah. But God knows, humor is important in a play. Because you don't want to put people through two hours without a laugh line now and then. I've done that – and it was a comedy."

Sherman's latest play, It's All True, is set in New York in 1937 at the opening night of Marc Blitzstein's play The Cradle Will Rock, which was directed by Orson Welles. It's All True is slated to open at the Tarragon Theatre in January.

Jason Sherman reads from It's All True at the Books and Bagels literary event, Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina, Sunday Dec. 6, 11 a.m. Members free, non-members $8.

Goldberg rules world of WCW wrasslin

By PAULINE DUBKIN YEARWOOD
Chicago Jewish News

CHICAGO — In the middle of the darkened United Centre, floodlights shine down on a four-cornered stage. In the centre of the ring, a couple of scantily dressed behemoths who weigh in at about 300 pounds each are grunting and shouting while hitting each other over the head with chairs. The crowd goes wild as the wrestlers appear to inflict life-threatening injuries.

Many of the fans are holding up signs. Most of them are homemade, and proclaim such sentiments as "Wolfpac Rules" and "Go Home Hollywood!" But there are also signs that read "Shalom!" Several of the signs are the colors of the Israeli flag decorated with a Star of David.

They don't say anything else. They don't have to. Everybody knows they're held aloft by fans of the current heavyweight title-holder of World Championship Wrestling (WCW), the man known simply as Goldberg.

Yup, Goldberg. Or, as the fans chant when he enters the arena, "Gold-berg! Gold-berg!" In a sport where the principals include "Macho Man" and the "Hit Man," a simple "Goldberg" is a rarity.

So, of course, is a Jewish wrestler. After all, it's not often you see in the ring a 6 foot 4, 285-lb., shaven-headed descendent of Jacob, who, you'll remember, was quite a wrestler himself.

But Bill Goldberg (he dropped the Bill from his wrestling moniker shortly after making his debut a little more than a year ago) has had a bar mitzvah, and he doesn't wrestle on Rosh Hashanah, which fell on a Monday this year, the biggest night for wrestling on cable TV.

While the 31-year-old Goldberg is unquestionably a hero to Jewish kids, he's also a hero to thousands who aren't Jewish and who have only the vaguest idea of what one is.

We do know a few things about Bill Goldberg. He grew up in Tulsa, Okla., the son of a Harvard-educated doctor father and a classical musician mother, who divorced when he was a teenager. Always athletic, he and his two brothers hunted and fished, flew gliders and acrobatic planes. He worked for a short time as a bouncer before attending the University of Georgia, where he was a football star.

He went on to play the game professionally as a defensive lineman with the Atlanta Falcons from 1992 to '94. He also did a stint with the Los Angeles Rams before a knee injury put an end to his five-year NFL career.

Recruited by another wrestler, "Diamond Dallas" Page, Goldberg made his WCW debut in September 1997.

He turned the body slam, known as the jackhammer, into his signature move, and his star rose quickly. In July, he beat "Hollywood" Hulk Hogan to become the world heavyweight champion.

Since then, he has continued to reign undefeated in more than 100 matches.

"We're high-paid choreographers who don't do anything fake," he said. "The only thing we do is act a bit. It is dangerous. It's as dangerous as it looks. In my most recent match, a guy almost got paralyzed."

Goldberg says that while he's a proud Jew, in the wrestling world, "I don't make a big issue of it. To me that wouldn't be right. I haven't had any reaction to it (in wrestling). Nobody comments on it.

"I have a lot of pressure on me being the world champion," he admits. "It comes with the territory. I think about being a role model in everything I do. I just go about my business and do the same things I've always done, but I take into consideration that little kids are looking up to me, and I've got to set a good example in everything I do."

Keeping his own Jewish name doesn't sound like it was any big deal to him, but others see it differently. To Rabbi Irwin Kula, "it came from somewhere deep."

Kula is the president of the New York-based National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership (CLAL), a think tank on many Jewish subjects, and both a fan and a friend of Bill Goldberg. He is "the family rabbi" for Goldberg's father and brother, both of whom have studied with him, and knows Bill too, though not very well.

But he does follow his career and, along with his 6-year-old daughter, attended one of his matches. What he found impressed him. Backstage, after the match, the competitor was obviously tired but "he took time for everyone who was waiting for an autograph. He is really extremely nice. He's gentle. What you see is what you get."

Mike Leiderman, a sports journalist and commentator, says that while speaking at a recent United Jewish Appeal fundraiser, "I mentioned Goldberg and the crowd went nuts. This is something that does not compute."

Yet, he says, "Jewish boxers were once so big. And hey, it's a living."

Even the official magazine of the league recognizes that there's something special going on with Bill Goldberg. Sports broadcaster "Stagger" Lee Marshall writes in a column in the August 1998 issue that "Goldberg is not only winning matches and the hearts of fans worldwide, but it seems there's also an undercurrent of ethnic pride being experienced."

Then there are those who see implications far beyond sports in the Goldberg phenomenon.

Bernard Beck, an associate professor of sociology at Northwestern University, sees him as a throwback to an earlier time in Jewish history.

"Jews have had a fascination with sports ever since they came to America, whether they played or not. It was a way of becoming very American," Beck said.

Today, he says, he finds it fascinating that "as we are becoming overwhelmingly white-collar, sedentary professionals, Jewish kids are looking for other images, other models of Jews.

"For young boys in America, questions of strength, vigor, mastery, domination, and having a place to express aggressive tendencies are very important. Wrestling shows are soap operas for boys and men."

Rabbi Kula takes the argument a step further, finding in wrestling a metaphor for Judaism in the late 20th century.

"Part of what this century has been about for Jews has been widening both what it means to be Jewish and our image of a Jew."

When he looks at Bill Goldberg, says Kula, he sees "a guy who, through his wrestling...recognized that he had a responsibility to his Jewish identity.

"Does that mean he is going to put on tzitzit and observe Shabbat? No, but it is another one of many Jewish journeys. We need to be aware of the multiplicity of Jewish journeys that are out there."

Kula also sees great metaphorical significance in Goldberg's decision to keep his real name.

"A person who in some ways is really assimilated chose to keep his Jewish name," Kula muses. "And then he dropped the 'Bill.' Well, 'Goldberg' is more Jewish than 'Bill.' I don't think he anticipated it that way. This guy chose not to take a more marketable name and it came from somewhere deep."

Kula's idea is that as we enter the 21st century, "maybe there is such a wide multiplicity to being Jewish that we simply haven't named all the ways."

And Goldberg the wrestler could be one of those ways.

The Inside Back

Loving us to death

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

I have always admired – but have had difficulty accepting – the Christian tenet of turning the other cheek. I'd like to ignore, even forgive, the spate of recent activity by so-called Hebrew Christians, but I cannot. So it's with some regret (but not much) that I unsheathe my daggers and point them squarely at the messianic menace that's been plaguing Toronto Jewry, setting its sights primarily on the young, the elderly and recent emigres.

There's been a flurry of activity over the past few weeks involving so-called messianic Jews, who, depending on with whom you speak, go by several definitions: Jews for Jesus, Hebrew-Christians, and even "fulfilled" and "complete" Jews. (During his earlier stand-up days, comedian Billy Riback, an executive producer of Home Improvement, and a brother of a good friend, would quip, "Jews for Jesus? Isn't that like saying Lesbians for Men?")

Whatever they call themselves, these believers have one thing in common: an unshakable faith that Jesus Christ (known in the movement as Yeshua) is the true Jewish messiah. They accept both the Tanach (the "First Covenant") and the "B'rit Hadasha" (New Testament) – the whole Bible – as the infallible word of God. They believe that there is one God, who eternally exists in three forms: God the Father, Yeshua the Messiah, and "Ruach HaKodesh" (the Holy Spirit). They believe in Yeshua's virgin birth, his sinless life, his miracles, his vicarious and atoning death, his bodily resurrection, his ascension to the heavens, and his personal return to power and glory.

Sound familiar? My Catholic friends would nod knowingly.

So live and let live, right? Not quite.

Consider: Central to the messianic philosophy is the belief that Yeshua is both "Mashiach Ben Yosef" and "Mashiach Ben David" (put another way, the Jewish messiah). And driving the whole zeal to missionize to Jews is the book of Romans' admonition to spread the Gospels "to the Jew first and then to the Greek [gentile]."

Messianic Jews routinely use and appropriate all kinds of Jewish symbols and trappings: kippot, tallit, menorahs, Israeli flags, and they even advertise Shabbat services. The blurring of boundaries is intentional, adding up to a relentless drive to convert Jews to Christianity, and evangelical Christianity at that.

Have they been successful? A 1991 study by City University of New York found that fully 12 percent of Americans who said their ethnicity is Jewish, or over 500,000 people, were Christian in their primary religious orientation, whether messianic or through mainstream churches. Now, that figure is probably more attributable to the soaring rates of intermarriage stateside, but if Canada is one generation behind the United States, as with many other demographic trends, we could soon be looking at 40,000 Canadian Jews who are regular churchgoers.

Messianic believers are taught to love the Jewish people, to befriend them, to reach out and to spread and share the Good News of the Gospels. (Baptists in the United States even passed a resolution calling on members to do just that). They love us. But it's obvious they don't respect us, because they reject the fundamental validity of Judaism, which, it should go without saying, does not hold out Jesus as our messiah and savior.

Did you receive a recent issue of The Messianic Times, a slick publication hand-delivered to Jewish homes in Thornhill and Downsview? Don't throw it out; Send it back, preferably with a letter saying you're not buying. Has someone (perhaps emboldened by a training tape called How to Reach Out to the Jews) put a friendly arm around your shoulder to "have a chat" about inviting Jesus into your heart? Just say no. Is Canada's new Christian television station, CTS, airing broadcasts of a kippah-wearing musician singing Christ's praises? Don't just hit the "off" button; write the station manager and the CRTC in Ottawa.

They love us alright. At this rate, they're going to love us to death – if we let them.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My mother is 79 years old and has fallen at home several times in the last few months. She has also become very forgetful, which is not like her. She lives with me and my family and it has worked out very well. My brother, who lives nearby, thinks our mother should look into moving into a seniors' residence, where there would be adequate help and nursing care available.

I do not agree. Why upset her this way? What should I do?

Confused Daughter

Dear Confused Daughter,

Your mother should undergo a geriatric assessment, which can be arranged through her doctor. She should also be assessed by a social worker in her community to determine how she is functioning on a daily basis. These two assessments will allow you and your brother to make an objective decision as to whether or not your mother requires placement at this time.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Your Klingons will love a Star Trek theme

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

Planning a children's birthday party? You must have a gimmick before you buy the cake, ice cream and loot bags.

What's it going to be? A blast into another galaxy? Soda pop and pop stars? An afternoon with penguins and parrots? Let the guest of honor help pick the party theme. Here are a few suggestions to get you started.

Masquerade party: Why wait for Purim? Decorate a few milk crates, and fill them up with dress-up supplies such as old bridesmaid's dresses, polyester leisure suits, costume jewelry, too-wide ties, shawls, hats, ancient pumps and loafers.

Stand by with makeup kits for lots of impromptu face painting. Get your camera ready to shoot the results, or use an instant camera and send your guests home with souvenirs.

Science specials: Round up enough vans to take the crew to somewhere seriously scientific and fun – a zoo or bio-museum – where they can view monkeys, parrots, tortoises, penguins, snakes, lizards, butterflies and tarantulas.

Check the telephone book, and ask around. Then call ahead and find out about group rates, group tours, and special exhibits. Save on travel time, and ask someone who does science shows, or handles reptiles or birds to come to you.

Arts and crafts shows: Have your party at a ceramic-painting studio. Let the guests choose from a selection of unfired pieces, and sit back while they turn out multi-colored masterpieces, which you pick up a week or so later.

Again, call ahead for party rates. Try an art and crafts centre, and have everyone making and decorating books or pencil-holders. Or try a beading party at the nearest beads-and-crafts shop, and let the gang make bracelets, rings and key chains.

At-home craft projects are noisier and messier, but cheaper, alternatives: Buy some magnetic stripping at a hardware or office supplies store along with lots of colored cardboard, beads, feathers and glue to make fridge magnets. Rent a button-maker, and make wearable slogans and designs. Get some chocolate or candy molds and cook up chocolates or lollipops.

Fan clubs: Have the fan-club party of your birthday child's dreams featuring the music of such singing groups as the Spice Girls, Backstreet Boys or Hanson.

Buy or borrow as many CDs or cassettes of the group's songs as you can, and buy several posters for decor.

Have the guests bring pictures or stickers of the group, or of a favorite singer, that they can collage onto blank CD cases, video cases or notebooks. Have a karaoke contest to all the pop hits.

Outer space party: Plan an outer space expedition with all the guests dressed as astronauts and space aliens, and decorate with galactic party trimmings. Invent a few space-alien words and have everyone building spaceships from paper plates and cardboard tubes.

Host a Star Trek or Star Wars convention for your favorite Vulcan, Klingon or Wookie. Hang up posters and comic-book covers and find Vulcan ears and alien masks at costume shops and dollar stores.

Minus the space helmets and masks, the cosmonauts could go where party guests have gone before: the planetarium or the Cosmodome.

Wild-West roundup: W'all, pardner, it's time for a birthday rodeo, with everyone wearing cowboy hats and packing water pistols. Rustle up some ten-gallon hats and some Western-style invitations, centrepieces and balloons at the local dollar store or party centre. Send the cowpokes and dogies out to a Western film, to a horseback-riding stable, or up the nearest (park) trail for some westernized games of freeze tag or Red Rover. Have the guests make "Wanted" posters featuring each other.

Be adventurous. Check your budget, have a birthday party planning session, and try something a bit beyond Pin the Tail on the Donkey. It might be fun for all of you.

Invitations always make the first impression

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Invitations are not the biggest expense in putting on a party, but they do give the first impression.

Here's what Mona Ungar of Essence du Papier (932-0109) and Aimee Berman of Pro Art Invitations (905-475-7111) have to say about choosing your invitation provider and working with her to make sure that first impression is good.

Look at what kind of event and setting you'll have and be consistent with the occasion and its tone. Think of your invitation as an integral part of a total event, especially if you like coordinated decor. Do you want elegance, fun – or a blend of both, as at a bar mitzvah, where a good time and an element of solemnity go hand in hand?

Choose a friendly, knowledgeable invitation provider with an artistic sense, experience in fine arts and design, and knowledge of stationery. The person you choose should also network with good contacts among graphic artists and the printing industry.

Berman values patience on both sides, while you and your provider pore over catalogues with their huge domestic and imported selection. Give the imported product a good look, urges Berman. Canadian invitations have shorter delivery time, but even considering the exchange rate, U.S. invitations are often less expensive.

Your invitation provider should be willing to give you the time you need to get the best, which includes doing research. And if you're busy, Berman adds, you may want in-home service, available outside regular business hours on holidays, evenings and weekends.

Ungar has found that while she depends greatly on repeat business, this in turn depends on versatility. Pick an invitation provider who does everything from conventions to kids' parties. The client who comes in first for her wedding often comes back for thank you cards, birth announcements and baby shower, maybe even corporate work.

One of the main responsibilities of your invitation provider is to inform you of the products and services on the market. Paper and other physical components vary from the familiar to the exotic, from traditional to contemporary. And the demands are so diverse, according to Ungar, that it's hard to talk about trends anymore.

Whether it's paper stocks, colors, printing, scripts, envelopes, cards, or accessories like seals and ribbons, the choices are no longer simple. In printing today, for example, you have engraving, laser or ink jet printing, and thermography (a process in which matter printed by letterpress is dusted with powder and heated to make the lettering rise).

Traditional and trendy are no longer opposites; handmade papers, for instance, are "in." So are double envelopes. These hark back to the days before post offices in England and Colonial America, when streets were full of mud and the outer envelope usually got dirty. Double envelopes were a sign of taking care with one's mail; they retain this significance, even in these days of paved streets and less mud.

Before you come in, advises Berman, have a general idea what you want. Most people do, says Ungar. Usually, they look at paper stocks first, then wording. Some, though, know in advance exactly what wording they want and bring in a typed copy.

Getting a proof is standard service, especially for something in Hebrew, Yiddish or a foreign language. In some cases, it may cost a bit extra.

For a big event, Ungar recommends booking at least two months ahead, three is better, especially if there are guests from out of town or outside Canada. You want to get replies about a month ahead. Some people book as far ahead as a year. Berman recommends booking four to five months ahead, and sending invitations four weeks in advance within Toronto, six to eight weeks outside.

When you make an appointment, Ungar urges, set aside an hour, even an hour and a half. You'll need time to browse through catalogues, as well as shelf stock. And while you should set a budget range, look at the stock first. Don't be overcharged, warns Berman. For a reasonable price, you can have both quality and uniqueness.

Korry's advises on dressing up husbands

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You're invited to a simchah, and you're not sure what to wear. Not only do you have to find yourself an outfit, but chances are you're responsible for your husband's attire as well. So, who can you call to get some advice on menswear?

The CJN recently approached one of Toronto's men's fashion mavens to pick his brain on how men should dress for more formal parties.

Saul Korman, president of Korry's at 569 Danforth Ave. (463-1115), is a much sought after expert on menswear.

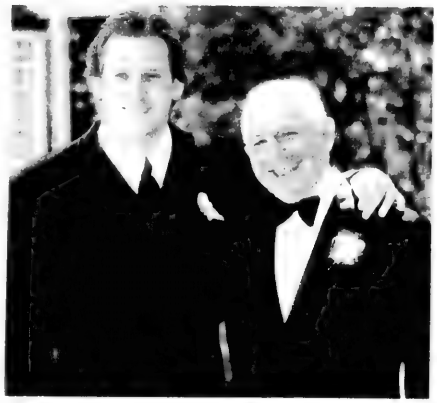
With more than 45 years in the men's fashion business, Korman has definitely earned his stripes. "It's very important that we look appropriate for the right occasion," says Korman.

"If a woman is wearing a cocktail dress, the man needs a jacket, but not necessarily a tie; He should look cocktailish. Women always out-dress men."

There are four types of invitations to elegant parties, he says. "black tie, black tie invited; black tie optional; and dress appropriately or elegantly.

A black tie event means wear a tuxedo, Korman says, "But if you have a black suit, and you put on a formal shirt and bow tie nobody will know it's not a tux. The only difference is the silk trim on the jacket and pants."

Korman says he offers "the tuxless tux" at his store, a black suit with removable silk collar. "I did that for my son Shawn's bar mitzvah because he thought he'd never wear a tux again. But at least he ended up with a nice black blazer and a nice black pair of slacks."



Saul Korman (right) with his son Michael.

If the invitation says black tie optional, black tie invited or elegant dress, Korman advises that a tuxedo be worn. However, for those people who don't own tuxedos he says, "a black suit will take you anywhere."

Some people look too harsh in black, so a dark blue suit can be substituted, he adds. But, he cautions that a "big faux pas" would be to wear a sports jacket or a pattern suit.

"You have to dress elegantly and appropriately for every occasion, as your wife does. And if you're not sure what to wear, call your tailor. If you don't have a tailor, you can call me for free advice."

Afternoon weddings and bnai/bnot mitzvah generally call for a dark suit rather than a tuxedo, says Korman. "If the invitation doesn't say black tie, don't wear one. You'll be over dressed... Black tie is optional for most weddings."

However, he says, regardless of whether the event is black tie or not, most simchahs tend to be elegant affairs, and so he finds it annoying to see the majority of photographers and videographers in casual dress.

"With all the money one pays for a simchah, the photographer can at least wear a jacket or a suit. It looks awful to see an elegant bride walking down the aisle, while the person with the video camera following her is wearing pants and a sweater."

He says these days there are a lot of options for formalwear – different kinds of vests and shirt styles – and one can choose between a tie and a bow tie in a variety of colors. However, if you're not sure, wear a bow tie, preferably in black.

"My son Michael, at his wedding, wore a black single-breasted tuxedo, high grey vest, white shirt and a magnificent solid grey tie. He looked very smashing. He wanted to look different.

"I wore a double-breasted Canali tuxedo with a vest, a formal shirt without wing tips, and a black bow."

According to Korman, the best selling tux is the three-button style with a vest, by Hugo Boss, a high fashion European label. "It's selling all over the world."

He says swing clothing is "very big with young people. We sell the big baggy pants and oversized shirts and jackets."

As for the white dinner jacket, Korman says, it's something one tends to see on cruises. "It gives men a second option for formal dress. The more expensive the cruise, the more elegant the dress. People love to dress up."

In jewelry, insist on the best

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Are you contemplating jewelry as a gift for someone special?

Fine jewelry is never inexpensive, but its esthetic, economic and sentimental value more than offset the outlay, according to Vladimir Ponomarenko of Belle Etoile (781-7500) and Lillian Moses of Lillian Fine Jewellers (920-7676).

They offer some points which might help you choose the gift you want.

There are different grades and types of gold. Fourteen-and 18-karat gold are alloys: the red kind is alloyed with copper; the white will have silver, nickel or palladium; and yellow gold is made with copper and palladium. Pure 24-karat gold is also yellow.

While gold and silver will never cease to captivate our eyes and minds, fashions in setting and finishing vary. Today, the matte, grainy sand-blasted look is popular for white and yellow gold. Platinum is sought after too, as its elegant grey gloss goes well with the trend to understated refinement.

That over-used line, "diamonds are forever," is true, says Moses. Like precious metals, they are always in style.

Items such as pendants, earrings and bracelets are always good gifts, though there are fashions in gems, she adds. Currently, rubies, emeralds and sapphires are popular.

Every diamond, Ponomarenko points out, is unique in cut, size and shape. This uniqueness is often enhanced by mineral content, invisible in itself, but present in sufficient quantity to give the diamond a red or yellow tint.

One precious stone currently in vogue is tanzanite, Moses says. She describes it as having the deep blue we associate with sapphire but richer, with more sparkle and a tinge of violet. Mined only at a few locations in Tanzania, it's rarer than sapphire.

White and black South Sea cultured pearls are also much sought after, Moses says. The black Tahitian variety is grown and finished in Tahiti, from black oysters; the white or Japanese variety, grown in the South Seas from white oysters, is finished in Japan. It can take five to 15 years to grow enough pearls for a necklace.

In both white and black variants, advises Moses, look for lustre or gloss, and roundness as well as size. The black variant often has a tint, with red or green being most highly prized. The basic color of the white variant should be pure, not creamy; but a rosy overtone is desirable, she says.

Ponomarenko stresses the importance of being specific about your budget. And make sure you know the range of quality this budget allows.

You can buy good plain gold rings or jewelry without stones for about $1,000, but for quality stones, you have to spend considerably more. Approximately $5,000 will purchase any one of various clear half-karat stones. If the stone is even a little less clear, its price can go under $2,000, though the impurity may be visible only through special instruments.

Look for a jeweller who carries a full range of styles, from the newest and most contemporary to traditional and antique; who takes the trouble to understand exactly what you want; who, if the item you want is not in the display cases, will order it; and who, if he does not provide a service such as cutting stones, will refer you or have the work done for you elsewhere.

The services are diverse, ranging from ring size adjustment to watch repair. They also include informing you of everything you need to know, making sure you understand the reasons for the price – even answering technical questions.

You have the right to insist on the best, Ponomarenko emphasizes.

And choose someone you will want to go back to, who makes you feel comfortable the moment you cross the threshold, Moses says.

Develop a long-term rapport with your jeweller and allow yourself time when you visit. If you want something which is not on display, order it well in advance. Every piece of jewelry worthy of the name is handcrafted, and fine craft work takes time.

Chocolate and ice cream a wonderful treat

M-mm. Lots of good chocolate treats from Chocolate Moose.

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

As the party industry has developed, providing desserts has become a specialty.

Depending on the size and kind of event, you probably still need an all-round caterer; but for events without a full meal, a dessert specialist may hit the spot.

Beverly Kruger of Chocolate Moose (784-9092) works directly with clients and caterers, on everything from creating goodies to round out the main course, to wrapping her own confections in colors that complement the decor.

And no matter how overwhelming the range of dessert choices, no matter how sophisticated your guests, time-tested delectations like chocolate and ice cream are forever.

Nazarit Peltekian of Baskin-Robbins (630-0747) observes that ice cream is perennially popular, though people are more demanding in flavors and quality.

For most people, quality ice cream is a healthy "calcium supplement" – a key point in a health-obsessed society. Peltekian sees some parents using ice cream to distract their kids from less healthy sweets.

People who are lactose intolerant can enjoy non-dairy ice creams; and those with minimal lactose tolerance can enjoy sherbets with two percent fat. Zero-fat and zero-cholesterol ice creams have 40 percent of the calories of the regular varieties. Then there are low fat, sugar-free ice creams for those who can digest lactose but have to go easy on the sweet stuff.

The food of love

Related products, such as yogurt, appeal to those who may not be able to eat ice cream. For many people, yogurt poses no lactose problem because the bacteria which form the yogurt also kills lactose.

Chocolate, which has a luxuriant, full taste, has been called the food of love, and Kruger points out that there are studies which prove this.

Kruger looks constantly for flavors that complement chocolate. Fruit and chocolate combinations are common; the light, often acidic tastes of fruits, and their textures which vary from crisp to pulpy, are set off by chocolate's dark, rich smoothness. Its soft, melting quality also contrasts well with the hard, crunchy texture of nuts.

Whatever desserts you choose for your party, insist on quality taste and ingredients; they're out there. As well, it's easier now to satisfy special diet requirements and still have delicious taste. The range of kosher products also gets wider every day

Book your dessert specialist at least a few weeks or a month ahead, Kruger advises. Allow yourself time to develop interesting, creative ideas.

Kruger always has more fun providing her service when she has input from her clients, and when she is able to exchange ideas with them, she says.

PARTY PLANNER

Planners make your day less of a headache

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

When you have a party planner at your simchah, you can be assured that little problems will not turn into disasters.

"A party planner does the little things that make life so much simpler for the hosts," says Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030). A host does not want to come to her own party, she says, and count the seating cards to make sure none are missing or tell the caterer that Uncle Donald has turned vegetarian and two less guests are coming than expected. "We allow hosts to be guests at their own party. We take care of all the details."

Gruenspan recalls the time she received a bomb threat before a wedding ceremony. "We called the police and dealt with the entire issue without the bride and groom ever knowing. The wedding went off without a hitch."

Gruenspan's partner, Sarah Cherry (905-764-7121), remembers a bride who broke the heel on her shoe. "I always carry a little hammer and a few nails just for that purpose," she says.

It might be a little thing to have a needle and thread at the synagogue, says Gruenspan, but if the bride's train rips and there is nothing to sew it with, that can turn into a big thing. "Most party planners will come with a Mary Poppins bag full of items such as makeup, toys for kids, earring backs or pain medication. "Planners anticipate incidents before they pop up."

A party planner can also come up with ideas that add finishing touches to an affair, says Cherry. "Why not put some fresh flowers in the bathrooms or add a small bunch of dried flowers on each place card?"

A planner should be part of the party from the moment she meets with the hosts, months or even years before the party, until the last guest has left the hall, says Gruenspan.

Heidi Gruenspan and Sarah Cherry.

Most planners, she says, offer a set fee from beginning to end, so hosts know exactly what they are paying. "A planner can offer a list of tradespeople, such as florists, disc jockeys or photographers, and then help choose the the most appropriate one. We are there to help validate hosts' choices.

"Several weeks before the event, the planner will make calls to make sure everything is confirmed. Does the host want to worry about that?"

The planner also makes up a schedule for the family, as well as the caterer and the professionals such as the makeup person or photographer. "Each person will know exactly when they are expected to begin their duties," says Cherry.

Planners often need to deal with sensitive issues, says Cherry, such as separated families or mixed marriages.

"At a time such as this, tensions are often high. We have to sit down, ask a lot of questions and try to get a sense of how each side feels. With regards to separated families, we have to figure out a seating arrangement that makes everyone comfortable. Sometimes step-families do not want to sit together. We do not want to upset anyone, and we want the bride and groom to be happy.

"A lot of people," she says, "need explanations about a Jewish wedding. A planner should be able to provide all necessary details," says Cherry.

Loot bags complete your kids' parties

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

A party without a loot bag is like a dinner without dessert. No party is complete without them.

David Silverman, who owns Venture...The Toy Plus Warehouse (905-709-4370) with his father Larry, says that kids just love the excitement of getting something after the party. "They can't wait to get into the car, rip open the bag and show the loot bag to their siblings."

It does not have to be an expensive venture to provide each kid with an age-appropriate loot bag, he says. "An average loot bag costs about $3.50, and if parents desire, we can do one for $1. A good party place will work at any budget."

David Leese, owner of Loots (787-5668), agrees that parents do not have to spend a lot of money to make the kids happy. "Kids just love the thrill of receiving. As long as it's cool, they'll be thrilled."

He says that loot bags today have to be on the "cutting edge. Kids love Crazy Bones, Spice Girls and blacklight candles. Loot bags change with the times, but the prices can remain relative," says Leese.

A service-oriented party store will have a staff member guide a parent through the loot bag process, says Silverman. "They will shop with the customer and help them pick out price- and age-appropriate items. If parents fill out a worksheet with the age of each child and a desired budget, things are done quickly and easily."

A $3.50 loot bag could include a light-up key chain, toy insects, nail polish or body glitter. "The bags could also relate to the season. Parents can buy Chanukah loot bags for a birthday party near Chanukah, or for a kid's Chanukah party."

Boys love hockey loot bags, says Silverman, which include cards or hockey pencils and erasers. "A tin of crayola hockey markers is a loot bag on its own, and the tin becomes a keepsake."

Professionally packaged loot bags have become quite popular, says Leese, because "parents are working and just don't have the time to put together their own bag. "Bags could have some Crazy Bones, a sticker book and a small amount of candy. They're wrapped and inscribed with each child's name. Kids can't help smiling when they see a bag with their own name on it."

Leese says that loot bag orders can be phoned, faxed or e-mailed in. "Loot bags have definitely come into the 21st century," he says.

The thrill of getting a give-away does not stop when a child becomes a teenager says Silverman. "Bar and bat mitzvah-age kids just love the give-aways at dance parties. Blow-up instruments, glow necklaces, hats and sunglasses always make a hit. Parents can save a lot of money by picking out these items themselves and giving them to the disc jockey for distribution.

"Some customers have put a give-away such as nail polish, body glitter or a key chain at each dinner plate. It can be done on a small budget, but it makes a big impression," says Silverman.

Bar or bat mitzvah loot bags could include "cool and kitschy stuff," says Leese. "Feather pens or paint box bubble gum are great for kids of that age."

They've got the moves down, from salsa to limbo

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Kids have loved to dance since time immemorial. For anyone under 20, dance and party are almost synonyms.

In fact, children and teenagers today are more active in their approach to dancing than their predecessors. The older generation spoke of dance "steps." The focus was on the feet. The younger generation, in contrast, speaks of "moves," which involve the whole body.

And while kids still learn standard steps, er, moves, they seem to be less shy about improvising than their parents were. And rather than choose between one or two in dances, they're aware of many different styles and willing to try them.

The current swing revival, for example, is not confined to adults. Dancers Lindsey Freedman and Jody Pettle have got kids from age eight up moving to the music that was in when their grandparents were teens.

Partly in response to trends, but mostly because they love dancing and kids, Freedman and Pettle formed Let's Dance (373-8595), offering dancing and dance-related games to liven up any party. While they specialize in kids' birthdays, Let's Dance is for all occasions and ages.

Freedman and Pettle teach the guests the moves for everything from hip-hop to line dancing, from Spice Girls hits to retro tunes by the Village People.

One popular game is called "dance freeze." At the beginning, music plays and the kids dance, then the music stops and the kids freeze in position. They have to hold their positions. Move and you're out.

Freedman and Pettle often end an evening with a limbo contest, always popular among kids of all ages. The dancers with the coolest steps and moves get prizes, but the emphasis is on fun, not competition.

Every birthday party includes giveaways and custom-made loot bags. Let's Dance supplies its own music and equipment. Freedman and Pettle work harmoniously with the other professionals at a party, and are the official dance company of the Mandell Entertainment Group.

There's more to the beauty of flowers than meets the eye

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

At your special event, the florist will make a significant contribution to the atmosphere and mood. You not only want to choose the best flowers, you also have to work with your florist to get the best service.

Susanne Carlascio of Wild Flowers & Company (663-2913) and Gord Dick of Van Bassen Flowers (222-6751) have many suggestions on how to make sure the flowers match the joy and significance of your celebration.

The traits of a good florist, Carlascio says, include personality, packaging and selling oneself. These qualities give the client a crucial first impression. Equally important, of course, is a strong artistic sense.

Carlascio and Dick agree on the value of recommendations, references and reputation. Whether anyone providing a service is good or bad, news spreads.

In addition, they say, you should find an experienced florist, see their portfolio and individual photos, and look at live arrangements. Get prototypes of the centrepiece, Dick urges, and of other major items such as the bridal bouquet.

Don't be shy in developing rapport, Dick says. Get your ideas out; you don't have to be an expert or specialist to know what you want. Take two or three visits if you have to.

The professional expert is there to guide you, says Carlascio. Some clients need less guidance than others. They have pictures and clear ideas of what they want; these ideas just have to be interpreted. Other people feel out of their element with flowers and need more assistance.

Lillies are good all year round

Find out what's in season, advises Dick. Lilies are good all year round, for example, but especially in late fall. Tulips, on the other hand, while they can be had all year round too, are at their best in spring.

A good florist has a strong sense of color; he or she knows how to arrange flowers in harmony, and as Carlascio puts it, make them "sing together."

You wouldn't put exotic tropical blooms in an English country garden setting, for example.

Of course, there's more to flowers than meets the eye: there's fragrance too. This has to be considered in conjunction with such factors as foods and their aromas, ventilation, and whether the event will be indoors or outside.

Carlascio also sees tactile sensitivity as part of the florist's artistic sense, even though we don't actually touch the flowers. When we see the way light reflects from leaves and petals, our brains translate the visual impressions into textures, matte or glossy, downy or velvety; this is a vital part of the pleasure of looking.

Ask your florist if he knows the hall or venue, Dick advises. Listen to ideas on matching the flowers to the setting. Bright hues will lighten up a room that's a bit dark, for example, whereas in a room with light colors, deeper hues can form a pleasant contrast. Some shades and tints show better in natural light; some are more effective in artificial light, he explains.

Carlascio points out that a florist should also have props, such as containers to match a specific table setting. This saves you some legwork and helps ensure that the flowers harmonize with the ambience and the occasion.

Dick recommends booking your florist three or four months ahead, earlier if your event will take place during a busy season. The details should be finalized at least two weeks before your event. You can't get your name down early enough, Carlascio insists, especially for a summer bride.

"Make sure your florist is not over-committed," Dick urges. "Ask flat-out about a specific date. Your florist should have time to concentrate on you, and not try to squeeze you in among three or four other clients."

A conscientious professional, Carlascio says, will not over-book, and will attend your event in person. For this reason, she advises choosing a smaller, hands-on company, which depends on personal service for its survival.

In any field, the best service providers depend on repeat business, Dick says. He and Carlascio agree that florists who like people and flowers will keep their clients happy. If you feel good about an event, so will the florist, and vice versa.

Always go with a professional videographer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

You probably would not ask your friend to cook the food for your wedding. Why would you have him videotape the whole affair?

"People think they can save money by having a friend be their videographer," says Randy Maxwell of All Event Video Corporation (254-9999), "but it's really not a savings; it is trading down."

Friends and relatives not in the business, he says, frequently encounter problems that only experienced professionals know how to handle – things such as running out of tape, running out of battery power, shaky images, choppy scenes, improper lighting or remote microphones resulting in poor and distant sound. "Do you really want to burden a friend or relative with that kind of responsibility?"

Ninety-five percent of the success of any video, says Maxwell, depends on who is in control. "Editing and special effects are not as important. A great camera is not great if it's in the wrong hands."

The creativity of the cameraman, he says, "makes a world of difference. He will not merely take pictures. He'll shoot from different angles and even get down on his knees if he has to. He also has the judgement to know when to film, and what scenes to capture."

Silvana Ramacciato of Together Forever Video (633-5971) says people who watch a professional video "live the wedding or bar/bat mitzvah again. Pictures do not capture the emotions of a video. When you watch a video, you're at the party."

The most up-to-date video camera, she says, is the digital camera. "The quality is superb, colors are crystal clear and the film can be reprinted again and again without losing quality. A wireless microphone can be clipped to the groom's lapel [under the chupah], so the couple is heard clearly and distinctly."

Most videographers have wireless cameras, she says, so there are no extension cords interfering with people on the dance floor. "Digital cameras also use less lighting. We use 20 watts lights so they do not shine in anyone's eyes. The stand-up lights bounce off the ceiling so there is a nice, even light. These are things that an amateur videographer will not have."

A videographer should know how to be low-key

Part of a videographer's service, says Maxwell, should be to interview the family a few weeks before the event, to establish exactly what it is they want. "Do they want each table filmed? Are there certain people, such as an aunt or out-of-town cousin that cannot be missed? These are questions that a professional knows to ask and they are things that make the video perfect."

A videographer should also know how to be low-key, says Maxwell. "The celebrants, not the video guy are focal. They should never interfere with, or pose family or guests. Microphones should never be passed around the table unless the host has specifically requested that be done. Clients should watch the video and comment how good it was, and that the cameraman was hardly seen all evening."

Most professional videographers know the venue they are about to film, says Ramacciato, "but if not, they should go out to the site before the event and make sure it is familiar to them. They'll know about the lighting and the angles – they'll be prepared for the job ahead of them."

Send in the clowns

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Want to liven up a party? Then send in the clowns. Better yet, how about hiring Madonna to sing for your guests, or Barbra Streisand, perhaps.

If your pockets are deep enough, you can hire the two divas to sing duets together. Or for a younger crowd, you might consider the Spice Girls.

The possibilities are endless according to John Balabik (410-5410) who runs Clown'n Around, an entertainment company offering entertainers and entertainment products for all age groups.

There are many talented and experienced entertainers on his roster, from clowns and magicians to celebrity look-alikes, Balabik says, and there is something for every budgets, he adds.

The traditional clown program, which is suitable for parties for younger children, lasts one hour and includes balloon sculptures, face painting, and a sing-along and games led by the clown. The package starts at $135.

For an additional $200 each you can rent a mini-ferris wheel, a candy floss, hot dog machine, or mini-donut machine. The price includes the supplies and delivery. An inflatable jumping castle, which starts at $225, is also available and is a popular item at children's parties, Balabik says.

Pony rides

But the pony rides may be more thrilling with the young set, he notes. For $225 an hour, a handler will bring two ponies to the party venue for an hour and organize pony rides for the children. All that is needed is a 20x20-foot space, says Balabik.

For something really different, he says Clown'n Around offers an exclusive party that may well be the ultimate party for Barbie devotees: Tea with Barbie. For $225, eight children and three adults can visit a real Barbie look-alike in her home – she was a Barbie doll TV model– and try on the more than 60 gowns and accessories made in children's sizes.

Barbie will also do their make-up in special hypo-allergenic products and give them a pedicure. Then they'll all sit down to tea and shortbread cookies. Mom and dad can also dress up and join in the fun.

The two-hour program can include additional children at $25 a child. Barbie also does home parties for the same fee.

In addition to celebrity look-alikes, Clown'n Around represents actors who will dress up as the children's favorite cartoon characters, among them, Teletubbies, Sailor Moon, Arthur, Barney and Batman. They all provide a one-hour program for $155, which includes balloon sculpture, face painting, and party games says Balabik.

Only limit is your imagination

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

An event planner can take an empty party room and turn it into whatever their clients desire.

"They can create a circus, a hockey rink, a Victorian garden – their only limit is their imagination," says Phil Greenspoon, president of Special Events by the Prop House Inc. (588-7725).

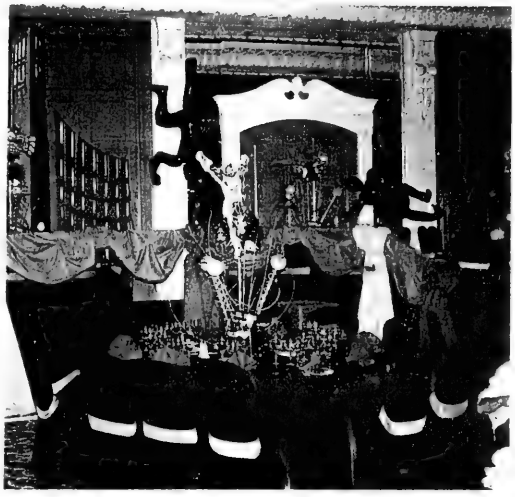
A theme, says Greenspoon, adds a lot of energy to a party. "Quite often, it represents the person being honored. A bar mitzvah party honoring a Maple Leafs fan can feature a ticket scalper handing out the guests' seating cards, and a dance floor decorated like a hockey rink.

"Each table has a hockey-themed centrepiece, and the disc jockey can sit in the penalty box surrounded by soft-sculpture hockey players. Disc jockeys love theme parties because it gives them a platform to perform."

Audrey Hyams Romoff of Special Event Architects (48-PARTY) says that depending on budget, an event planner can develop a color theme or produce an entire theme party.

"We can create a disco party with reflecting balls and lots of glitter and glitz, or we can have a simple black-and-white party. It all rides on the budget and the client's desires."

Party planners like Special Events by the Prop House can turn a party room into whatever your heart desires.



A theme, she says, is the umbrella that gives you the hook to hang everything on. "We can get the guests' attention immediately by incorporating the theme into the invitations, and that can be done inexpensively.

"When people receive an eye-catching invitation, they begin thinking about the event. There is immediate expectation. A good party starts at the invitations."

An event planner should initially draw out the client's interests and then work out a budget, says Greenspoon.

"If the budget is small, we might only have centrepieces such as a hockey stick and puck surrounded by glitter. Four- or five-foot-high centrepieces on every table can make a room look great. When guests walk in, the whole room looks full."

If there is room in the budget for more than the centrepieces, says Greenspoon, then the planner should start thinking about decorating the head table, the disc jockey's booth and the entrance to the party room.

"Then, if they can, they can link all the areas together. Any profes-

Registries remove guess work

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Gift registries take the guesswork out of giving presents.

Ellis Chitiz, president of Deblins Linens (782-2910), says when guests buy a present that the bride and groom have registered for, "no matter what the giver chooses, she knows that it is something the young couple can use and that it caters to their taste."

When a bride comes into a store to register, he says, she should expect the staff to help her choose everything she needs to set up her new home. "A knowledgeable staff person can point out items that the bride may never have thought of herself."

By registering for gifts, he adds, the bride can choose gifts at a variety of price points, so there is something for everyone to buy, at any budget.

Rozsi Goodman of Goodman's China (638-2630) agrees that a bride should expect personalized service when she registers for gifts. "A staff person should work with her, finding out about her tastes, establishing a budget and matching items together. The bride should never be left without help."

When registering at Goodman's, she says, brides can choose from three types of registry systems – notification, delivery or pick-up. "If they've chosen to be notified, we send regular updates of what has been purchased for her and the gifts never have to leave the store, until she is ready to set up her home. The advantage of this is that the bride can switch items if she chooses and can move to a different price point if she is able to. It is a very flexible way of shopping."

Leaps and Bounds

Registering also makes life a lot easier for the wedding guests, she says. "If they are spending money on a gift, they want to know it will be put to good use."

Chitiz says that when registering at Deblins, which specializes in bedding, towels, home accessories, and casual and formal table linens, the bride's choices are entered into a computer that can be accessed from any of the three Deblins stores. "When a bride calls, we can tell her exactly what she has received and she can decide whether to add to her list or make some changes.

Registering at Deblins, he says, is a practical choice. "Everyone needs blankets, linens and towels. They can be both functional and decorative."

The registry business is growing by leaps and bounds, says Chitiz, because people "just do not have the time any more to run around looking for the perfect gift. It takes the risk out of buying."

Goodman says that, especially with china, she has found that if a bride does not register for a good set when she gets married, chances are she will never get one. "Somehow, after the honeymoon, there is always something else to buy. Then they have children and good china is the last thing they think about. Not that they would not like to have a set, it's just that other things come first. I always encourage brides to register for that good set and they'll have it for life."

RPG Entertainment says interaction begins the moment you book the company.

Live and interactive

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If you're planning a celebration, someone will probably ask if you're having interactive entertainment. This phrase is bandied about a lot these days. But what does it mean? And does it fit into your entertainment plan?

Philip Hart of Hart Entertainment (762-2200), and Rob Gray of RGP Entertainment (485-4195) agree that in the broadest sense, interactive entertainment includes traditional activities like dancing. You're interacting with other guests, not sitting still as a spectator or playing a solitary game.

In a sense, Gray says, interaction starts the moment you book your entertainment company. Your relationship is synergistic because you stimulate each other to come up with ideas.

Usually, though, interactive in this context means that the audience interacts with the entertainers. It's about encouraging guests to have fun by helping to provide the entertainment.

Hire professionals you trust, advises Hart, but give lots of input so that they know what you want.

And book them a year ahead, Gray advises: you'll need plenty of time to work out the details.

Some events, like Purim parties, use more interactive entertainment; others, like traditional weddings, use less. No occasion is 100 percent interactive, so decide whether you want a little or a lot.

The common denominator for most parties,Gray says, is the focus on the guest of honor. At a wedding, all the guests should have a good time, but especially the bride and groom.

Consider your demographics, Hart urges. A bounce castle is great for 4- to 9-year-olds, he says, but not at a bar mitzvah, where most kids are teens or pre-teens. Where the guests range in age from four to 104, he recommends carnival themes and other similar ideas, which, with simple games like ring toss, appeal to all ages.

Attitudes change with time, too. In dancing, Gray sees a shift to a mixed format, where the DJ or band leader steps offstage and leads a dance, then follows this with dancing for couples. Today, this is often done to introduce a new generation to swing music, which is enjoying a comeback, he says.

As for theme parties, there's virtually no limit to what you can do, from medieval pageants to game shows. Sometimes, too, Hart has learned from experience, a facility used in one theme can be adapted to another. A portable laser maze, for example, fits equally well in a James Bond theme or at a science fiction party.

True interaction happens when all the guests are involved, Gray says. It means the entertainer is visible to everyone – sometimes on stage, where everyone sees him at once, sometimes mingling and talking with guests one on one. And it needn't be complicated. It can be as simple as getting guests to sing the chorus of a song.

Adapt

A good entertainment company, Hart says, can adapt to any size and locale, from 12 teens in a basement to hundreds of conventioners in a large hall. In this connection, he stresses the need to give the locale a thorough inspection: size, layout and facilities make a difference.

Guests like the unexpected, Hart says: With miniature golf, for example, you can bring in an instructor. They also like the personal touch, he says: things like putting "Rachel's Bat Mitzvah" on a golf scorecard.

Gray likes breaking the entertainer-audience barrier, by having the DJ mingle with guests at dinner to talk about their favorite music.

Original ideas and what you do with your props or apparatus, are more important than the equipment itself, according to Gray and Hart. And make sure that any equipment not provided by the DJ comes with an operator who understands it, and clicks with the DJ and other party professionals.

Don't confuse interactive with high tech. Something as low-tech as getting a friend of the bar mitzvah boy to ask questions during a game show is just as interactive as virtual reality. Interactive entertainment was with us long before the phrase was coined.

sional can guide hosts through the whole process of decorating a room to a specific budget."

One concept that has guests talking for days, he says, is the live centrepiece. "For a cocktail party, the centrepiece could be someone's face painted to blend in with the rest of the table. The person goes underneath the table and puts her head through a hole in the centre. When guests realize what they are seeing their energy level goes through the ceiling.

"Planners can incorporate live hockey players, musicians or psychics into the centrepiece. Once the centrepiece realizes they've been noticed, they respond to the guests. Everyone loves it."

The goal of a party planner, says Romoff, is to have guests walk into a room and say Wow! "We want them to be transformed into the mood of the party."

A walk on the singles' side

TERESA STRASSER.
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

I remember coming home from my first date with a boy.

There was my mother, waiting up in the buzzy fluorescent light of our kitchen. She was gripping a cup of already cold tea, her elbows propped up on the table.

This was a big moment for her, a single mother watching her only daughter enter the potentially painful world of men. I waited for the onslaught of probing questions as she tightened the belt on her faded chenille robe and looked up at me excitedly.

"Well, what did you have?" she asked. "What did he have? Was it good? What came with it? Did you have dessert?"

An alien could have landed in our kitchen at that moment and have easily been able to deduce one thing about our family: Jewish.

Like many Jewish families, food was at the heart of our rituals, even though we weren't very religious. Every year, when the streets were deserted on Christmas, we ate chicken chow fun at the Hong Kong restaurant.

There were the usual Jewish soul food favorites — kugel and brisket and chicken soup. And there were rules: Two people should never order the same thing, so as to avoid culinary redundancy.

I was raised to love food. Still, on that first dinner date I inexplicably suffered from the fate of many young women of all faiths. I'll call it "Salad Syndrome." That night, and dozens to follow, I ordered nothing but a salad, which I daintily ate as though the jejune meal was the most satisfying dish ever.

I am not a big girl, but neither am I small. Who was I kidding? It had to be pretty obvious that I was putting away more than artfully arranged radishes and oil and vinegar dressing. Make no mistake, however, this was no eating disorder. I ate just fine. Just not in front of him.

I don't know what I was trying to hide. Was it my appetite? Not just for food but for all of life's more visceral pleasures. Or was I simply trying to hide the food in the teeth, the garlic on the breath, the bread crumbs on the chin that would clearly define me as human.

I guess I wanted to be more mysterious than mortal, more refined than ravenous, more lettuce than lamb chop.

To me, a man who likes to see a woman eat is as good a catch as that salmon. And a man who feels comfortable sharing food? That's even better.

Last weekend, I fixated on a woman's plate at an all-you-can-eat buffet in Las Vegas. She was dining with her boyfriend. I looked at her sparse array of celery sticks, garbanzo beans and small hunks of cantaloupe and felt I knew her. "Salad Syndrome," I thought to myself.

I wanted to lean over and whisper, "Why don't have a little slice of cheesecake? It's not going to kill you — at least not today."

I wanted to tell her that food isn't always a guilt-inducing vice, an attempt to stuff the hungry inner child, a replacement for love or a sign of weakness. Sometimes food is just a snack. And it tastes good.

I wanted to grab a fistful of her bitter celery sticks and let her know it was time for lunch, not a showcase meal for her meathead boyfriend.

Because famine is no longer an option.

Photographs

All that's left when guests are gone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Pictures capture the emotion of the moment, says Arnold Machtinger, owner of Photos by Arnold (905-881-6372.)

"While videos are a recording of the event, photographs reveal the emotions of the subject. Pictures and video definitely complement each other. There is room for both at a simchah."

Machtinger urges people to view a photographer's work before hiring him. "If you don't see his work and he gives it to you for free, it might still be too expensive."

It is also important to find out who will be actually photographing the event. "Don't assume because you meet a photographer, he will be the one taking the pictures. Make sure you ask. You deserve to know what you are getting for your money.

"It is also important to establish at the first meeting, what is included in the photographer's base price. Discuss your budget, and together, you can decide what you can have done. Everything should be up front. You don't want to have any surprises."

The photographer should stay for the entire party, from the portraits before the event until the guests say goodbye. "He should always ask if there are any particular shots the hosts want. Sometimes the hosts are excited and forget to mention someone. A good photographer will be able to guide them along, so all the right pictures are taken."

Photographer should be dressed like a guest

The photographer, he adds, should be dressed like a guest and should act as unobtrusively as possible. "No one wants a camera shoved in their face, but they do want their picture taken. A good photographer knows how to shoot without getting in anyone's way. He can also anticipate what is going to happen and grab the moment."

Clients can expect the photographer to shoot almost 300 pictures at a wedding or bar/bat mitzvah. "The average sale is about 36 or 40 pictures, so the clients have tons of pictures from which to choose. If the pictures aren't shot in the first place, however, the choice will not be there. It is always better to overshoot. Clients cannot buy what is not there."

Negatives should always be kept, he says, so clients never have to make a "final, final decision. They can always buy more pictures."

Happy clients, says Machtinger, know that all that is left after a simchah is the photograph album. "When the party is over and done, what else is left? If you want to remember your event properly, budget for photographs accordingly. It is something that no one ever regrets."

Judaica:
Add a special meaning to gifts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

A Jewish gift adds special meaning to a bar/bat mitzvah or wedding.

"Its wonderful to receive a gift that touches the spiritual meaning of the life event," says Riva Green, who owns Matana Judaica (905-731-6543) with Naomi Raanani.

Robin Bergart, store manager of Israel's Judaica Centre (256-2858), says that people are "flattered when their guests remember the occasion by its connection to Judaism.

"I received a kiddush cup for my bat mitzvah, and when I got married I used the same cup at my wedding. It was engraved with the name of an aunt who had died, so it really meant a lot to me. It was a gift that lasted long after other gifts were forgotten."

Green says that her stores offers a registry service for bar/bat mitzvah or wedding gifts, "and you'd be surprised about the gifts that the kids pick. They've chosen a chanukiah, a kiddush cup or a shofar. Some kids have chosen books on Jewish art, Israel, Jewish history or the Holocaust. They feel that by choosing these gifts, they are keeping with the spirit of the occasion."

A chanukiah, she says, is one of the top selling gifts, especially if the event is around the Chanukah season. "People choose any style from the traditional chanukiah to modern versions made out of glass or ceramic. We have fun chanukiah such as Disney or Sesame Street, or an artistic one that features a klezmer band."

A top selling gift

Bergart says that kids have received a Torah pointer or a shofar that comes with a stand so it can be displayed during the year and used during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Wedding gifts, she says, are less focussed on the individual and more focussed on the family and family rituals. "A mezuzah , challah cover or seder plate, for instance, are gifts that recognize that the couple is Jewish and that there is a connection between the couple and the gift giver."

Many of these items, she says, are works of art in themselves, so even when they are not being used, they can be displayed and enjoyed.

Green says that she deals with artists who make limited edition kiddush cups, seder plates or Shabbat candles. "These things are a double gift – a religious item and a piece of art. Young married couples really appreciate the gifts for what they are."

There are so many occasions, says Green, when people can give gifts that are not connected to Judaism. "Why not make a bar/bat mitzvah or wedding a special event and give a gift that acknowledges the special occasion?"

A good caterer has many talents

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Have you chosen the caterer for your next party? Two experts with ideas on how to choose, are Deanna Schaffer of Malmar Catering and Tastefully Yours (638-0091), and Perla Azulay of Prestige Fine Cuisine (782-7840; out-of-town 1-888-735-0374).

A good caterer likes food, people and parties; she's good with decor, psychology, organization and money. And she gives your party the same commitment that she would if it were hers, Azulay and Schaffer agree.

Caterer and client need trust and rapport from the beginning. If the rapport is there, Azulay says, you know within five minutes; it's like two friends speaking together. You feel as much at ease as if you were invited to your own party as a guest.

Be open about your likes and dislikes in food and decor, Schaffer advises, so that the caterer can envision exactly what you want. Be open about your budget too.

Within every budget range, there's a range of quality, she says, and a moderate amount well spent buys better food and service than a lavish sum where caterer and client misunderstand each other.

You, the client, are in charge; the party is first of all a showcase for you, only secondarily for your caterer, Azulay says. At the same time, she adds, you have to accommodate your tastes to hundreds of people; you have to make everyone happy, not just specific groups.

Schaffer says the caterer can't please absolutely everyone 100 percent. Personal tastes and requirements are too variable. A caterer who's ready to accommodate the unusual, however, can please almost everyone.

In the end, however, you have to trust the caterer to carry out your wishes, whatever she may think.

Wonderful meals prepared by Prestige Fine Cuisine.

In choosing the menu, Schaffer recommends tasting a sample meal first. Recommendations and references are important, but there's no substitute for trying the food yourself, she says.

Azulay qualifies this, pointing out that sample meals show what the caterer can do, but not what she will do for a huge crowd, with time constraints and unexpected glitch-

Party on the 'beach' year-round

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like a beach party in the middle of February.

At NorthBeach Volleyball (446-0777), beach parties are a year-round affair. The indoor beach volleyball facility, founded in 1993, is housed in a 30,000-square-foot space at 74 Railside Rd.

The centre is made up of sandy volleyball courts. "We're really Toronto's biggest sandbox," said NorthBeach Volleyball co-founder Roland Macrae. "We're giving people the beach. They're playing in the sand in the middle of winter."

He said he has worked to turn a former factory space into a "tropical paradise" that offers beach volleyball enthusiasts a year-round venue.

Finding a venue for volleyball was the reason the centre was established, Macrae said. He and his wife had been looking for a place to play volleyball. They found one in a school, but they could only play there once a week, he said.

He had also played some outdoor beach volleyball with his neighbor. The two became business partners and set out to establish a venue that combines beach and indoor volleyball, he said. "We would have the best of both worlds."

They hoped to attract players of both types of volleyball, he explained "We didn't know if the concept existed…There was a rumor there might be an indoor beach volleyball centre in the States. Nobody knew the name."

He contacted the New York Volleyball Association and by coincidence the person running the association happened to be the owner of an indoor beach volleyball facility in Rochester; so the partners had a model for their volleyball centre.

Getting landlords to see the wisdom of the concept was a hurdle the partner had to surmount. But within three years, they outgrew their first location in Markham and are now located just east of the Don Valley Parkway off of Lawrence Avenue East.

Clients started asking to hold parties at the centre, Macrae said.

"We didn't know anything about birthday parties." But they put a package together which was well received, he said.

"We [now] get up to 1,000 kids a month when we're busy."

NorthBeach Volleyball is used by day camp groups during the summer and is also the venue for corporate parties and community group events, he said. The facility has also been used for informal bar mitzvahs – hosts bring their own caterers and DJs and make use of the centre's dance floor.

NorthBeach Volleyball has become a popular birthday party venue according to Macrae. He said birthday party packages start at $6.50 per child for a minimum of 15 children. This package, called the "picnic package," does not include food or drinks – people create their own menu, he said.

The second package, called "the beach party," includes food and beverages and costs $8.50 per child for a minimum number of 15 kids. For an additional $15, a party supervisor can be hired to run the party, he said.

"Most people are happy to have someone else run the party.

"The games person's job is to keep the party really exciting. They do relay races. They do volleyball sand castles. Five- and 6-year-olds enjoy doing different games. They use a lot of beach balls. They're soft and stay in the air a long time."

He said the centre also makes sand toys available for the younger children. "They just like to dig and play."

The birthday party host can rent a court for $48 an hour, so that parents of the guests can play a game of volleyball while they wait for their children, he said. "They have just as much fun as the kids."

Other places to throw a party are Acqua Ristorante & Bar (368-7171); Atlantis Complex (260-8000); Baycrest Hospitality Services (785-2500, ext. 2477); Beth Radom (636-3451); Casa Loma (923-1171); Estate of Sunnybrook (487-3841); Hanks Diner (905-474-9930); Le Parc (798-7246); Liberty St. Cafe (533-8828); Millie's Bistro & Gourmet Market (481-1247); Novotel North York Hotel (218-3866); O Mei Restaurant (635-5050); Paradise Banquet Hall (661-6612);Pickle Barrel (493-4333); Premier Ballroom & Convention Centre (905-709-1759); Radisson Plaza Hotel (515-2578); The Rink (410-7469); The Rock 'n' Diner (449-5245); ROM (586-5859); Scaramouche Restaurant Pasta Bar & Grill (961-8011); Sheraton Centre (361-1000); St. Lawrence Hall (392-7130); Tri Elm-Beth Jacob (222-1230).

A virtual wedding

By NEILIA SHERMAN
Special to The CJN

Technology met tradition at the wedding of Alan K'necht and Carrie Silverman (known as gOgO BegOnia) last August.

Touted as the world's first Video Gesture Controlled Virtual Reality wedding, the nuptials combined the use of video, virtual reality and computer technology in order to make this couple's vision come true.

gOgO had been dreaming of having a "virtual" wedding since she started doing media relations for the Vivid Group, a virtual reality company, six years ago. K'necht was a bit reluctant at first, because he wanted to be sure that the religious requirements of a Jewish wedding would be met.

They consulted with Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who gave them the go ahead and then Rabbi Phillip Scheim took over when Rabbi Kelman had to be out of town on the date of the wedding.

The unusual ceremony, which took place at the Civic Garden Centre in Edwards Gardens, positioned the bride and groom in front of a camera that captured their live image and placed them under a computer-generated chupah in various virtual reality situations.

Wedding guests were able to watch the couple perform their ceremony from within a unique interactive digital world. The couple chose Canadian paintings by Tom Thomson to create 16 different virtual worlds, four for each season, with which they would interact. They touched snow in winter and leaves in autumn; the bride dropped flowers in the spring; and the groom broke a virtual glass in summer.

Guests were treated to a pre-wedding show that depicted the bride and groom in various virtual situations such as playing drums, playing human ping-pong, catching underwater fish and body painting.

Interestingly the non-traditional technology helped bring the past to life, as K'necht's family members were shown with a visual family tree.

K'necht says the reaction of his relatives was positive. "They appreciated the way in which I was able to include my ancestors in the ceremony, even if they were no longer with us."

K'necht, an Internet Consultant, came up with the idea of Netcasting the wedding as well as building a wedding Web site [www.knecht. on.ca/algo].

" The Web site proved very valuable," he says, " as many of my relatives and friends in other parts of the world got the opportunity to get to know gOgO before they met her at the wedding. And by allowing Web site visitors the opportunity to leave us messages, we were able to make them feel part of the whole thing."

Alan K'necht and gOgO.

Rabbi Scheim, a computer enthusiast, was pleased that he was able to perform the non-conventional ceremony. He says that although it was unusual, all of the traditional elements were adhered to.

"In these times, the marriage of two Jews is worthy of encouragement and my impulse is to try hard to say yes if the essential requirements of tradition are met," he says.

Since the ketubah, the blessings, and the giving of a ring took place " in reality," the form of the chupah and the glass breaking did not impact on the validity of the ceremony.

Technology, while often regarded as impersonal, actually facilitated many touching moments, as images of the couple's extended family were brought to life on screen.

Also shown were childhood pictures of both bride and groom and a travelogue of the adventures they went on before getting together. K'necht explored Australia and Israel, while BegOnia lived in Asia and Africa. Guests were also treated to the image of Alan and gOgO, (then just Carrie) sharing their first kiss at his bar mitzvah. They went their separate ways then, only to be reunited through the Internet a couple of years ago.

gOgO wore a formal wedding gown and veil for the ceremony, and later changed into a clingy white dress, which she wore with an African wedding veil and white platform shoes.

Surrounded by cameras, a large television screen in front of them, the couple went through their personalized ceremony, as their guests gazed on in amazement, sometimes laughing, at other moments solemn.

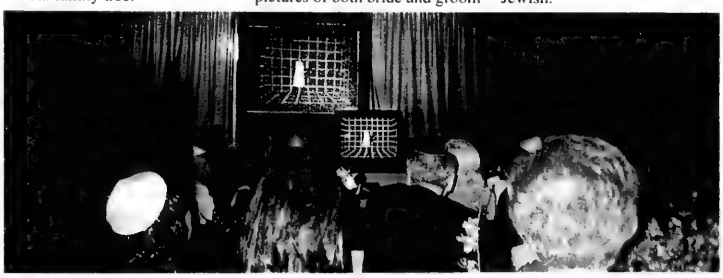
The groom's father, proclaimed the wedding to be "a taste of things to come in the 21st century."

There was a feeling that both sets of parents had been apprehensive about how their guests would view such an unusual wedding. Yet, throughout the reception, a strong sense of family and a commitment to Jewish traditions was evident.

At one point, both sets of parents were honored, as their contemporaries and those of their children came forward and circled them in the traditional mizinke dance. According to custom, when the last child is married off, the occasion is marked by a special ceremony during which the bride and groom place wreaths of flowers on their parents' heads and all sing and dance for them.

It was an image that showed the coming together of the old and the new to perpetuate an ancient custom with a new millennium twist.

Guests were good natured about the unconventional wedding in spite of the extensive media coverage and the unfamiliar vegan food. Jean Bernholtz, a close friend of the groom's parents, said she enjoyed herself immensely: "It was upbeat, nobody was bored and it was very Jewish."



Guests watch the wedding ceremony on a computer screen.

PARTY PLANNER

The centre of the party

What people remember most about any simchah is the quality of the music

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Every celebration should be unique, says band leader Morris Kast of Morris Kast & the Sky's Band (565-1620 or 905-731-0881).

The uniqueness, he says, comes from the music. "It's the centre of the party. What people remember about a party is the music."

There are a lot of bands out there, though; so how do you pick the one that will treat your event as one of a kind?

"You have red-letter days a few times in your life," says Larry Rodness of the Larry Rodness Band (650- 5858). "But you want a band that makes every performance a red-letter event."

Know a prospective band in advance as well as you can, advises Rodness. Get references and recommendations, see a video, hear them live. Find out how many members they have and how long they've been playing. Look for tasteful dress, high standards of conduct and extensive knowledge of the business side of entertainment.

Kast suggests getting references from the band's last five jobs. Never mind how they sounded a year ago; they have to be good now. And no matter how well they play a standard tried-and-true repertoire, you want a band that grows and learns.

Rodness and Kast both attach great importance to rapport with the band leader. You're placing the success of your event in his hands, so the bandleader has to merit your trust.

Besides being a good musician, the leader has to work well with you and with other party professionals like videographers. He or she has to be well-organized and able to minimize crises like power outages so that they don't disrupt the evening. And while he needn't be a technical expert, he should have top-flight equipment and a top-flight technician to man it.

It's the leader's responsibility to watch the crowd and match the music to the mood: gentle or laid-back at dinner, for example, but energetic when it's time to dance, to keep the dance floor full, Kast says.

Rodness recommends choosing a band with plenty of singers. In a party band, he says, they matter more than instrumentalists.

Kast also sees singers as essential. "The more there are, and the more versatile, the better," he says.

Party music is quite different from a concert, Rodness says. You go to a concert to hear a specific singer, instrumentalist or group, or music in a specific style. At a party, the band come to you, and should match your tastes and that of your guests.

Both band leaders say they need a wide repertoire to please a large, diverse crowd. Kast goes so far as to discourage hiring a band known for a special style. Opt for versatility and a band big enough to have plenty of specialists, but not a specialty band as such.

Sometimes you may want a specialty band – say, Dixieland for a 1920s theme party, or rock & roll for a teen's birthday, they suggest. At extended-family events like weddings or bar and bat mitzvahs, however, there may be requests for anything: old standards, swing, Latin, disco. The better-travelled and more diverse your guests are, the harder they are to satisfy.

A party band has to please everyone all night long, not just one group for a few hours. And while music lists help to provide some overall structure, a good band can improvise as well.

Find out how many breaks the band takes, and how long – and make sure they take them when music isn't needed. During the main course and when the sweet table opens are the best times, suggests Kast, who advocates taking two breaks; Rodness prefers three.

Hire professional, full-time musicians, says Kast.

Rodness recommends hiring members of a professional union like the Toronto Musicians' Association. As a craft union, they have a vested interest in upholding high standards, and if you have a dispute or complaint, they will mediate.

Remember, warns Rodness, that low price and good quality don't always go together.

Both he and Kast advise booking your band as soon as you have the date and the hall. The best bands are in high demand, so call as early as you can.

Henna painting in demand at simchahs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The old adage, "East is east and west is west," no longer applies in this day and age; eastern countries have increasingly embraced western culture, while western societies have adopted many eastern customs.

Acupuncture, meditation and yoga are among the eastern practices commonly accepted in western societies. Now another eastern tradition has become all the rage – henna painting or mehndi, the art of adorning the body with a paste made from the henna plant.

Mehndi has been practised in India, the Middle East and Africa for centuries, and has just recently become a popular trend among youth in North America.

Indeed Henna painting is now in demand at bar/bat mitzvah parties.

Two Toronto-based women, Lisa Karachinsky, 24, who runs The Henna Girl (372-5641) and Melanie Marcus, 22, who runs Little Miss Henna (905-731-0067), have been capitalizing on this new trend by offering henna painting services at simchahs, parties and corporate affairs.

Over the centuries, people have always liked to adorn themselves, Karachinsky, a graphic arts student at the Ontario College of Art, said in an interview. She attributes the recent popularity of mehndi to its use by celebrities like Madonna and Mira Sorvino.

In fact, the Toronto henna artist herself has had the opportunity to adorn some Hollywood celebrities. She created designs for Yasmine Bleeth and Richard Grieco at Florio Design, a Yorkville hair salon, and she was asked to do an arm band for Christian Campbell, (brother of Neve), for a television film."It was very exciting," she said. "I created a tribal arm band for him [Campbell]. It was great."

An intern at a magazine in New York City (N.Y.C.) this summer, Karachinsky noticed henna artists practising their craft in some of the upscale jeans stores in Manhattan, she said. "The work they were doing was unoriginal. I thought, 'I'm an artist and a designer. I can do that much better.'"

She went to do research on henna design and technique in N.Y.C.'s Jackson Heights, where the East Indian community tends to be situated, she said.

"I knew I was going to bring henna to Toronto... For me it is perfect. I can earn money using my creative talents."

She initially began her work at Lunatic Fringe, a jeans store on Eglinton Avenue, and at Florio Design. After Rosh Hashanah, she expanded her work to bar and batmitzvahs and other private parties.

Karachinsky also had booths at the Molson Indie and the CNE, where she trained people to help, because there were constant lineups for the henna designs.

Henna is a good activity for bar or bat mitzvahs, she said. "The kids want it. Mothers don't have to worry. Henna is all natural and dries on the surface. It fades and disappears as the skin exfoliates."

It usually takes her under five minutes to adorn each person, and she can usually accommodate 50 to 70 kids in a evening, she said.

Lisa Karachinsky

"The adults get in line as well."

There are a wide variety of designs for adults to choose from, including Celtic or tribal designs or an astrological sign. The children get flowers, butterflies, bracelets or designs running up and down their fingers, she said.

People should avoid using black henna, Karachinsky noted, because according to her dermatologist, that color dye may be toxic.

Little Miss Henna is run by Marcus, a graduate of both Western and York universities who plans on going to dentistry school. "I've always wanted to be a dentist. I want to do orthodontics to put smiles on people's faces," she said.

These days her henna creations are making people smile. She's been working at bar and bat mitzvahs and sweet 16s; the henna is a hit with both hosts and guests, and she's getting a lot of business through word of mouth, she said.

"The parents love it more than the teens. Grandmothers like it just as much."

While travelling in Europe this summer, Marcus saw that women and men were using henna, she said. "A lot of them had their hands dyed or they were wearing henna arm bands.

Seeing their work, she said she decided that she would also take up this art form. "I said to myself, 'I can do this. I'm artistic.' So I began doing it... I became really involved with it.

"The designs and the drawings came naturally. I can look at a picture and draw the exact duplicate free hand without using a stencil.

"Henna is a flower from the Middle East and India," Marcus explained. "Its [dye] is all natural and will last from two to three weeks. It just goes on the first layer of the skin."

People like it because it wears off, she said. "It's just a temporary tattoo... If you do make a mistake, you can remove before it dries. It takes between five and 10 minutes to dry."

Hindu, Indian and Sephardi Jews use henna on the skin before a wedding, she said. "Generally it's women who do this. There's a myth that the darker the henna goes on the skin the greater the love of the husband for the wife."

She got her first customer while talking to a sales clerk about her henna business; a customer overheard the conversation and promptly booked Marcus for a bar mitzvah, she said.

She usually begins the henna painting during cocktails, she said, but stops during dinner and resumes during the dancing.

Marcus does anklets, wrist bands, rings and whole palms. "I apply it with a bottle with a pointed mettle tip. I fill up the bottle with henna and apply it freehand. A simple design can take a minute, but a very intricate design on the palm of the hand could take 20 minutes," she said.

On average she spends five or 10 minutes with each person; at a bar or bat mitzvah, she does simple designs for all the children, which take about two minutes a child, she said.

Younger kids like the Nike sign, flowers or Chinese symbols, while 16 year-olds prefer arm and wrist bands and rings with a design on the hands, Marcus said.

"I love doing henna," she said. "It's so much fun. The kids love it. They have a great time with it."

The High Holy days don't have to be a mystery

By RICK LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Choosing a date is the obvious first step in planning a bar or bat mitzvah. Finding out the dates in which the High Holy Days will fall in a couple of years, is now possible with the online Hebrew calendar, HaYom.

Available in Macintosh and PC, HaYom tells you about the upcoming Jewish Holidays and Hebrew months, as well as a bunch of other interesting information – not to mention a little built-in music for the occasion.

When the HaYom program starts, it presents a window telling you the Hebrew and civil dates, the sunset and sunrise times, and a saying or something interesting about the day. If it is a special day such as a new month, appropriate information will appear.

What I really like about the program, is the ability to view and generate future calendars. Before personal computers, we had to rely upon store-bought calendars, which only had available dates for the upcoming year. With HaYom it is possible, not only to check calendar dates well into the future, but also to know for example, the days when Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur will fall.

Now you can plan a simchah well in advance around these important holidays.

As I entered HaYom a couple of weeks ago, I found the following information: Monday, November 16, 1998/Heshvan 27 5759, the sun sets at 5:47 p.m. and will rise at 8:17 a.m. The quote for the day was, "Happiness, in fact, may be defined as the certainty of being needed."

A positive outlook like this may be all that is needed to start the day off on the right foot.

This is a great little computer program with many useful features, and is a must for anyone who requires information on future Jewish holidays.

By the way, for the benefit of those who don't own the program, Yom Kippur falls on Monday Sept. 20, 1999, Monday, Oct 9, 2000, and Thursday, Sept. 27, 2001.

HaYom is available by writing to the software's author A.G. Reinhold, 14 Fresh Pond Place Cambridge MA 02138-4430.

Further information can be obtained on its Web site [www.hayom.com].

There is another company dedicated to developing excellent software for the Jewish community.

DAVKA Corporation has been marketing Hebrew titles for years, and among their many useful products is the Simchah Planner, which claims to make planning simchot a snap.

Simcha Planner, available only for MS Windows, is a database program that allows you to keep track of all aspects of guest information, from table assignments to specific meal requests. Create guest lists and track responses, address envelopes, arrange table seating and create and print a wide variety of useful lists.

It seems to me, the only thing the program doesn't do, is pay for the simchah!

DAVKA has a catalogue of Hebrew software titles, which can be obtained by contacting DAVKA at 773-465-4070 or on its Web site [www.davka.com].

Good luck with your simchah planning and don't forget Chanukah falls on Thursday, Dec. 2nd in the year 2010!

Even when the celebration was over, Natan Kitaykisher couldn't believe that Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz had just conducted his wedding.

"I still cannot believe in what I've just seen," said the 26-year-old leader of the Jewish congregation in the Ukrainian town of Slavuta. "I could never dream of it."

Slavuta was not on the original itinerary of Rabbi Steinsaltz, an Israeli rabbi known for his translations of the Talmud into modern Hebrew, English and Russian, who was leading a group visiting the Jewish memorial sites in southwestern Ukraine.

But Kitaykisher, who studied a few years ago at a yeshiva run by Rabbi Steinsaltz in Moscow, heard of the rabbi's plan to come to the area and asked if it was possible for him to arrange a stop in Slavuta.

Because the synagogue in town was so rundown, the ceremony was conducted outside the the town's only modern public facility – a concert hall.

Most of the town's Jews showed up, many of them out of curiosity.

The heroes of the occasion – Kitaykisher and Eleonara Rabina, an engineer from a neighboring town – looked tense during the affair.

The wedding was performed in accordance with Jewish ritual. A red-velvet canopy with silk yellow fringes was brought from Kiev, as were a ketubah and kosher wine and food for the few dozen guests.

The only substitute allowed was a light bulb wrapped in plastic, which the groom used instead of a glass to crush at the end of the ceremony.

The wedding, which featured a local band playing Jewish melodies, was the first Jewish religious wedding in the town in at least 15 years.

In the 19th century, the town's name became famous for its printing house among Jews in the Russian empire, as it was one of the few Jewish printing houses functioning in Russia at the time. The Slavuta Brothers printing house, as it was known, issued the bulk of chassidic literature printed and even had a copyright on the Babylonian Talmud in Russia.

Caribbean paradise an ideal place for your honeymoon

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

St. Croix, an island paradise in the heart of the Caribbean can be the perfect honeymoon spot.

It is rich in history and varied in architecture. Its eclectic culture is a mix of different nations: Spain, England, France, the Knights of Malta, Denmark and the U.S.

This tranquil tropical island has breathtaking rolling hills dotted with sugar mill ruins, old plantation homes, spectacular beaches and an exotic rain forest.

Adventurers and romantics alike will marvel at the many activities and historic attractions offered throughout the island, including Christiansted National Historic Site comprising of Fort Christiansvaem, the Steeple Building, the Old Scale House, and the Old Customs House.

Other places of interest are Fort Frederick, St. George Village Botanical Garden, Salt River and Columbus Landing, St. Croix Leap – a woodworking shop in the rain forest, the St. Croix Aquarium and the Cruzan Rum Factory. Touring the island can be fun by bike or on Sweeney's Safari Bus.

St. Croix with its two quaint cities, Christiansted and Fredriksted, is the largest of the United States Virgin Islands and boasts of three unique properties perfect for lovers seeking an intimate escape from winter's doldrums.

Rest and relaxation come easy at the Tamarind Reef Hotel, the Hibiscus Beach Hotel and the Hotel Caravelle, all individually family-owned.

Billowing palms

Surrounded by billowing palms, the Tamarind offers its guests an island oasis on the edge of the sea. Adorned with a golden beach and its own marina, this distinct AAA Three-Diamond resort, situated on St. Croix's northern coast is ideal for families.

Complimentary snorkeling equipment, windsurfers and ocean kayaks are all available. Otherwise, guests may want to lounge by the pool or test their sporting skills on the tennis/croquet courts.

In addition to a host of amenities, some of the 46 tastefully furnished pastel colored seafront rooms come with kitchenettes. Rates are from $145 US based on double occupancy. Of course the hotel isn't exclusive to honeymooners and children six and under stay free.

Be sure to ask about their discounts to "virgins" – we're talking only about first time visitors here.

Hotel Caravelle, a charming European-style hotel, located on the water's edge in historic downtown Christiansted hosts guests who enjoy being were the action is.

The hotel has 43 newly-refurbished rooms surrounding a refreshing swimming pool, a casual waterfront restaurant and bar overlooks the busy harbor. You can shop till you drop at Hotel Caravelle's duty free arcade.

Believe it or not, guests at the Caravelle can earn a diploma from the University of St. Croix. Participants in the environmental studies program must book one of two island tours offered by local operators and stay at the hotel for at least three nights. Upon completion, families are issued an island ecologist diploma.

The Hotel Caravelle has teamed up with St. Croix's newest dive shop SCUBA to offer its guests a number of memorable packages. A four day excursion costs $391 and includes a superior room and two dives.

Deluxe rooms, double occupancy, are from $149-$169. Kids under 12 stay free. Family packages are available.

The Hibiscus Beach Hotel is only 15 minutes away from the airport, 10 minutes from Christiansted and 20 minutes from challenging golf courses.

Moreover it's only seconds away from one of 38 oceanfront rooms to a comfortable hammock swaying over one of the prettiest beaches on the island. Guests can play in the sands and salt waters that the turtles call home for as low as $130 per night, double occupancy.

A package deal four four nights including rental car, sports activities and all meals and drinks is $1,715 US a couple.

D&D offers several tent packages that include tables and chairs.

D&D accommodates all your guests, no matter how many

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're thinking of throwing a small dinner party for 400 of your closest friends, D&D Rentals (665-9570) can help you plan the affair.

D&D stands for Dorice and David, a husband and wife team who run a party rental business out of their 10,000-square-foot headquarters at 56 Martin Ross Pkwy., one traffic light north of Finch off of Dufferin Street.

The Silvermans, who prefer to be called by their first names, began their rental business in 1982. The Dublin natives initially rented tools, but increasingly the demand was for items like tables and chairs, and they shifted their focus, David said.

Today they deal exclusively in party items, he said. "Renting is performing a valuable service for a large number of consumers who don't want to purchase the desired articles, but need them for one affair only."

D&D carries everything from linens, cutlery and dishes, to tables chairs and tents. The company specializes in the rental and assembly of tents, which David said can be used for a variety of occasions – bat/bar mitzvahs, showers, birthday and anniversary parties and other special occasions.

"People who want to have the affair at home are looking for a certain kind of ambience. It's not a moneysaver, necessarily, but you can do it for different prices.

"Over the years we've acquired considerable expertise in tents," he said.

Before erecting a tent, D&D will measure and inspect a site, and provide the customer with a free estimate and a computer-assisted design for the space. Some people have no idea about what they can actually do with their garden, he said.

"We fill out the empty spaces for them. You see an empty piece of land and you can actually build it up. We visualize for the customer what we can do for them.

"Once we see the space, we can offer suggestions on how best to do the layout. We do a layout on the computer. We draw the tent and chair layout in 3D."

D&D carries frame tents – spacious tents without centre poles – that can accommodate from 40 to 400 people, he said.

The set-up takes place a couple of days before the affair so that the clients have enough time to decorate and organize the interior, he said. The tenting season generally runs from the end of April to the end of October, depending on the weather, said David. "We provide heaters to keep people warm."

D&D offers several basic tent packages that include lights, cutlery, china, linens, tables and chairs. A basic package for 40 guests will cost approximately $700 with tax; the same package for 400 is $6,500.

A 30 x 40-foot tent will accommodate 120 people, a buffet table and a bar and will cost just under $2,000, but if people want to dance, a 30 x 50-foot tent will hold a 15 x 18-foot parquet dance floor that will add an additional $900 to the bill, he said.

A party with a dance floor for 200 people will require a 40 x 70-foot tent with an 18 x 24-foot dance floor and cost just under $5,000 including taxes.

All the packages can be upgraded with more elegant dishes and chairs, hidden ceilings, and fancier draping and interior decorating, he said.

Other rentals available at D&D include coffee urns and chafing dishes in varying sizes, bars, bar equipment, popcorn, hot dog machines, and large group barbecues, David said.

He buys new dishes for Pesach, and people who want kosher dishes for their seder use the new dishes directly from the box, he said. "I do a lot of business at that time of year."

For corporate clients, D&D rents out urns, coat racks, and can set up staging and draping for corporate meetings and trade shows, he said.

D&D offers a pick up and delivery service, but most people come in to pick up small orders, David said. If D&D doesn't carry an item that is requested, David will get it or direct the person to a competitor because, he said, "the customer is important to us."

These outfits from Tilly's show that Tilley's isn't just for hats.

Dressing for elegant parties

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You're invited to an elegant party or maybe you're just going out for a night on the town and you need a new outfit.

Why not stop by Tilley's Endurables at 900 Don Mills Rd. or 207 Queen's Quay W. on the main floor.

Tilley's, you may be asking, the company that makes those wide brim cotton hats?

Yes, you may be surprised to know that Tilley's (441-6141), the noted travel and adventure clothing company, introduced evening wear – TilleySilks – several years ago.

TilleySilks look and feel like fine quality medium-weight silk, but they're made from a Japanese woven microfibre which is machine washable and dryable, and require little or almost no ironing, according to Nathalie Belanger of Tilley's marketing department.

She describes the line as "dressy with the right accessories, but not formal."

There are various mix-and-match pieces that make up the TilleySilk collection, among them a tunic top, tunic vest, camisole, long sleeve blouse, and long and short mock wrap skirts, which can all be accessorised with the Tilley sashes, belts and scarves. The colors range from evergreen and aqua to purple, fuchsia and black.

This year's eveningwear has been augmented by the new Soho collection, a line made of a polyester fabric in a flowing black and stone print, which is easy care and can be packed small without wrinkling. It can be paired with TilleySilks or TilleyKnits, says Belanger.

The Soho collection offers the sarong skirt in two lengths, one which is ankle and the other knee length. The sarong looks like a wrap skirt, but has an inner skirt made of plain black chenille, she explains.

She says the wrap styling is made with a special fold to prevent it from being blown open; it also has a draw string waist for comfort, and it can be worn with a matching camisole; and/ or the new black tailored jacket which has been added to the TilleySilk collection.

Comfort is an important factor in the clothing at Toni Plus (512-0341) which sells fashion for larger women, says company founder and president Toni Tiraborelli.

To add to the comfort, you see a lot of clothing with elasticized waists, says Tiraborelli.

Toni Plus fills void in market

Toni Plus, founded in 1992, has four retail locations. Tiraborelli, who was running a retail womenswear chain, was approached by the upscale North York mall, Bayview Village, to open a fashionable clothing store for larger women, she says.

"We were filling a void in the market place for better quality and more fashionable clothes for larger women. [At the time] there was a lack of designers in the plus-size market. We worked very hard to get some designers on board."

Canadian designer Brian Bailey is one of the Toni Plus' main designers, and now international companies like Anne Klein and Ellen Tracy also have collections for large women, Tiraborelli says.

From the start, Toni Plus, which carries sizes 14 to 22, had a positive customer response because they liked the merchandise mix, she says. "We were getting calls from across Canada."

The store did a trunk show for its clientele in Calgary – customers ordered from the samples – and finally she decided to open a store there, which is located at the Calgary Eaton Centre.

This year's styles tend to be simple and functional. The long tank dress with side slits is very important, and these basic pieces can be dressed up with accessories like boas, she notes.

"There's a shift to more sportswear for evening dress. A velvet suit can be teamed up with a beaded shell." Long, slim ankle-length skirts in stretch and burnout velvet are popular this year, she adds.

Black is always big for after-five-wear; other colors being shown are jewel tones like amethyst and deep claret. Silver is more important than gold as an accent color according to Tiraborelli.

The tuxedo pant suit, which she describes as slim ankle-length pants and a jacket in matching material, is usually in a fine black wool fabric with satin lapels, she says.

The look is completed by "a sexy camisole," she adds. In addition to its flagship store at Bayview Village, Toni Plus has two more Toronto locations – Sherway Gardens and First Canadian Place.

Other fashion places advertising in this issue are Jordan's Apparel Ltd. (667-1175).

Book caterer as soon as you can es. Suppose a speech is five minutes too long and a dish has to come out late; it still has to taste good. The last piece of chicken served has to be as fresh and moist as the first, she says.

Book your caterer as soon as you have the hall, advises Schaffer, even if it's years ahead. Your first meeting should establish rapport. At the second meeting, talk about likes and dislikes and get the caterer to offer you different options, and a sample meal.

Thereafter, stay in touch and exchange ideas. At your third meeting, review your options and finalize the menu; at the fourth, you should finalize the contract and make a deposit. Hold your last meeting, to clear up details, a few weeks before the party.

In Azulay's experience, a client usually starts by saying what she feels is expected, not what she really wants. The caterer has to be a good, patient listener, who doesn't rush clients or put them on the spot, she says.

Clients are smart, Azulay says, and know what they want. However, they need to be encouraged to come out and say it – and they do this only with professionals whom they trust.

Schaffer concurs. Clients start off shy, but once the caterer draws them out, they become effusive, even poetic, she says.

Both Schaffer and Azulay see their profession as a challenge. People talk about whether a caterer is good or bad. If a caterer is bad, people tend to remember it longer than if she's good, they say.

Until the party, moreover, neither you nor the caterer knows how things will work out. This sums up why you need trust. There are always problems, but if the professionals at your party help you minimize them and deal well with those that do come up, your event will be a success.

Travel through time

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

Visitors to Jerusalem can take a whirlwind tour of the city's past on the Time Elevator.

For this ride, you don't need a hat, sunscreen or special hiking boots. All you need is your imagination.

Since its inception on Aug. 20, more than 5,000 virtual travellers have taken the Time Elevator back into Jerusalem's past, from the era of David and Solomon, through the Crusades, and into the heart of the Six Day War.

Yehuda Malimovka, general manager of Time Elevator, said he expects some 400,000 visitors to travel on the ride within its first year of operation.

The Time Elevator, housed in Beit Agron in downtown Jerusalem, is a 25-minute ride that turns your world into one of illusion and virtual reality.

The ride features the latest in multi-media and simulator technologies. Riders are seated on platforms that move in front of three large screens. The soundtrack – simultaneously translated into six languages – is piped in through individual headsets which deliver unbeatable surround sound.

The ride is translated into Russian, French, German, English, Hebrew and Spanish. Although the show deals with Islam, Malimovka said, there is no Arabic translation.

The voyage through Jerusalem's past, all but catapults you out of your seat as the Time Elevator makes its way down an underground roller-coaster maze.

The warning given about the ride – not suitable for anyone prone to dizziness or motion sickness – is not to be taken lightly. There is nothing virtual about the ride itself: you get jolted forwards, backwards, and from side to side.

For pregnant women, children under the age of five and those prone to dizziness, there are stationary seats.

Kids take a trip through time. Since Aug. 20 over 5,000 travellers have gone into Jerusalem's past.

When the lights go down, your journey through the past of the world's most influential city has begun.

Within the first minute, you are plummeting down a large gaping underground hole. Wooden beams stop you from crashing into a large man with a grey beard who is wearing a black robe and black kippah. This is Shalem, your tour guide.

After exchanging a few pleasantries with Shalem, played by Chaim Topol (star of Fiddler on the Roof), you ride through the underground tunnels to an open barren area where you find Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac on Mount Moriah.

From there, you are whooshed into the era of David and Solomon. Here you witness the famous Judgment of Solomon, in which a baby claimed to be the son of two mothers, is delivered to his rightful mother. In our story, Shalem is that baby.

The producer has Solomon bestow the gift of immortality on the baby, which enables Shalem, a 2000-year-old character, to recount the story of Jerusalem through the telling of his own adventuresome life.

Among the episodes in which Shalem appears in Jerusalem's history, we see him rebelling against the Romans, living as one of the only Jews left in an idol-filled Jerusalem in the midst of Aelia Capitolina, and crying at the Kotel in the aftermath of Jerusalem's liberation in 1967.

This condensed tour of Jerusalem's past does not inundate you with facts,but at the same time it is informative. The ride will excite both the well-researched and the newcomer to the history of Jerusalem.

The Muslims conquer Jerusalem, and build the Dome of the Rock. It is the first time that three monotheistic religions meet in Jerusalem.

There is only 25-minutes allotted to Jerusalem's 3,000-year-history so you are rushed from here to there. From the Crusades you are transported into the War of Independence, the Six Day War and finally, modern-day Israel.

The Time Elevator ends with a spectacular panoramic view of Jerusalem, and you are left with a feeling of wanting to travel around Jerusalem again.

The ride is housed in Beit Agron, 37 Hillel Street, Jerusalem. Tel: 011-972-2-625-2228 Fax: 011-972-2-625-2227.

Dressing up your sons for a simchah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You've got an affair to attend and the whole family is invited – even your son. You double-check the invitation and there it is in black and white – "and family."

Reality sets in. Your son is definitely on the guest list. And you start to think: Will he sit still? Will he spill his drink as usual? Will his outfit stay clean for longer than five minutes?

Then you come to the ultimate question: What will he wear?

Well we have no ready solutions here for teaching boys etiquette. But there are experts who can help you dress your sons for a simchah or special event. Beatties (481-4459) at 430 Eglinton Ave. W., near Avenue Road and Amore Children's Boutique (654-8117) 1242 St. Clair Ave. W., just west of Dufferin, are two stores that specialize in dressing boys of all ages and sizes (husky as well) from head to toe in casual and dress clothes.

(Beatties also has a men's division, while Amore carries girls' clothing.)

Both Bruce Hadden, founder of Beatties, which is more than 45 years old, and Susan Young owner of Amore, which has been in the same vicinity for 15 years, offer suggestions on how to dress your boys.

Beatties, which occupies 4,000 square feet of retail space, offers fashionable, higher quality clothing, says Hadden. "We carry brand names like Tommy Hilfiger, Nautica, Calvin Klein, North 44... We run promotions. We really focus on offering special values on brand names for our customers."

Amore, described by Young as a "department store for children," specializes in European children's sportswear from France and Italy, offering such brands as Miniman, Marese and Jean Bourget from France, and Mimi from Italy, she says.

"We carry newborn up to size 16. We do quite a lot of boys' suits and tuxedos which are made in Canada. Catamini is designed in France."

Both Hadden and Young agree that the first suit purchased is frequently the bar mitzvah suit, although Amore also offers tuxedos and formal wear for ring boys.

Hadden suggests that people buy the bar mitzvah suit six months ahead of time. "I reserve it for them. They come back for the fitting about two weeks before the bar mitzvah. We don't alter it until then. We'll change the suit if the child has a growth spurt."

Black and navy, and taupe for spring are the most common colors for the bar mitzvah suit, he says. Boys' suits start at $99 and can go as high as $299. Every bar mitzvah suit comes with a $25 gift certificate, he adds.

Young notes that a dark suit in gaberdine, a light-weight year-round wool is the best purchase for a bar mitzvah suit because it can be worn all year round.

"Black and navy are still the most popular. We sell a lot of coordinating vests, as opposed to three-piece suits," she says.

"The tendency for a bar mitzvah is to buy a suit two or three months in advance. We can anticipate the size. I'm pretty good at guessing. We give advice on how to fit the children."

No alterations are done until about 10 days before the event to ensure a perfect fit, she says. "The growth spurts are in the legs and arms."

An elegant but more relaxed look is a blazer, Young says. "The print could be hound's-tooth or Glen check coordinated with solid-color pants... Boys' fashions follow the trends in menswear – blazers now are single breasted because this is what men are wearing more of."

Vests can be worn with dress pants, she says. "Generally a print vest is coordinated with solid color pants. They get the dressy look without the expense of buying a suits."

At Amore, suits start at $180, blazers at $150, vests at $39, and dress pants at $49, she says. A banded or Mandarin collar shirt can be paired with a vest or blazer; a mock turtle neck or a dressy long sleeve polo shirt can be worn instead of a dress shirt, Hadden says.

"We're the only ones [in Toronto] to carry the Italian knits for boys. The dress polo knit is higher end so it looks dressier."

Beatties also carries a line of dress shirts that require very little ironing, he says. "Pierre Marie offers a button down shirt in white, blue and stripes that retails for $29.95. Just throw it in the washing machine and dryer."

Children invited as guests to a bar mitzvah can wear dress pants and a sweater or vest a in cotton or silk, he says.

COMPLETE PARTY PLANNING BY PROFESSIONAL EVENT COORDINATORS

Let kids party somewhere else

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If the thought of 15 or 20 children running around your house doesn't thrill you, you may want to consider holding your child's birthday party at an indoor playground or specialized party facility.

These places are geared to large groups, there are usually plenty of activities to keep the children occupied, and best of all, someone else gets to clean up the mess.

Playland Kids Play and Party Place (667-PLAY), a 3,500-square-foot facility at 5050 Dufferin St. Unit 106, just south of Steeles Avenue, offers children a wide range of activities to choose from, says owner Mira Shlyonsky.

She immigrated to Canada in 1976 from the former Soviet Union where she was a teacher. The party business she started six years ago was a way to get back to working with children, said Shlyonsky, now a grandmother of two.

The spacious playground area with custom-built tunnel and slides has motorized bicycles and pedal cars, play houses, a beauty salon and a workshop, as well as a separate area for infants. Children also have use of the arcade and video games.

In addition, Playland has two specialty rooms – a glamor room with costumes, makeup and face painting done by staff members; and a warrior room with a staff supervised laser game for children over five.

During the week Playland is a drop-in centre. The drop-in hours vary on weekends, and people are advised to call on Fridays for an updated message on the weekend hours, Shlyonsky said.

The cost of the drop-in is $6 for the whole day with in-and-out privileges; an additional $2.50 will cover the laser game, which lasts about 15 minutes, she noted.

Playland also offers a baby sitting service at $4 per hour for any child, toilet-trained to 9 years old.

A birthday party at Playland lasts two hours. Guests have the use of the playground and their choice of one of the specialty rooms, as well as use of one of the two party rooms for an hour and a half, Shlyonsky said. "The place is spotless and we supply invitations."

A birthday, holiday or special occasion party includes a host to supervise the children and clean up, cake and juice, and pizza from several selected places; for a small additional charge, kosher pizza is available from My Zaidy's, she said.

The cost, at $10.95 per child with at least 10 children, includes a free gift for the birthday child. At least 20 children are required for what Shlyonsky terms a "private party" or exclusive use of Playland.

Playland also offers catering, balloons, loot bags and entertainers as an optional service, she said.

For an unusual birthday party, parents may want to consider inviting some unusual guests to the festivities – perhaps an iguana or a python or a horn frog. At Reptilia (905-761-6223) a 6,000-square-foot reptile and amphibian breeding facility, educational centre and retail store, children attending birthday parties have the opportunity to have "a close encounter with reptiles," Reptilia general manager Josh Feltham said.

"It's as close as you'd ever want to get. This is a hands-on experience. The child gets to hold various kinds of reptiles and snakes, lizards, turtles and tortoises, under supervision."

Located at 91 Fernstaff Crt., Suite 8, in Vaughan, one block north of Langstaff Road just west of Dufferin Street, the 3-year-old facility offers an original venue for a birthday party and is an educational experience to boot.

Reptilia will also do a home party and bring some of the animals to a person's house within the Greater Toronto Area, Feltham said.

The birthday parties include a presentation about the different types of reptiles and amphibians – how big they get, where they live, what they eat. The presentation lasts between 45 minutes and an hour, and is held in a classroom that can accommodate up to 36 people.

The starting cost of the party ($169 Monday to Thursday, and $199 on weekends) includes two slices of pizza, beverage and cake for 12 people. A lower price can be negotiated for kosher parties, he added. There is a $50 charge for every four additional people.

"Reptilia started as a store, but it quickly became clear that education was an area to focus on," Feltham said.

Reptiles and amphibians can be good pets for children who have allergies, but certain reptiles commonly sold as pets, such as iguanas, do not necessarily make good pets.

A wedding in Ukraine

The local Jewish community was destroyed during the Holocaust. Among those Jews who returned to the town after World War II was Rabbi Yitzhak Liberzon, who was one of a handful of rabbinical authorities to stay active in the post-war Soviet Union.

The community was rebuilt as a result of Rabbi Liberzon's efforts. Since the rabbi's death 15 years ago, however, the community has gradually declined.

According to Yakov Baram, chair of the Jewish community, the town of 35,000 individuals is now home to 240 Jews.

At least one Jewish activist in Slavuta said the present will be the final chapter in the region's Jewish history. "There is no chance for revival here," said Mikhail Lerman, the leader of the region's Jewish population. "Our future is in Israel."

Kitaykisher disagreed. After the wedding, he said, a young couple came up to him and asked if he could help arrange "a real Jewish wedding" for them, too.

Party planning event

Rick Levine and Lynn Cohen will be holding their annual flagship party planning event Jan. 26th 1999 between 6pm and 10pm at Le Parc Banquet Hall, on Hwy #7 at Leslie Ave. in Markham.

This event will appeal to everyone who is in the planning stages of a wedding,bar or bat mitzvah or corporate event.

The party planning public will mingle with over 70 of Toronto's finest party planning experts who will share invaluable tips and expert advice.

Demonstrations, samples, music, and many helpful activities will take place throughout the show. Dozens of useful contacts can be made in one evening to help a person plan the perfect celebration. Admission and parking are free.

This event is in its seventh year and will be an evening of fun and entertainment for the entire family.

Lebanon role debated

Pullout considered after losses mount

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An alarming rise in the number of Israeli troops killed in southern Lebanon has re-ignited debate over the wisdom of Israel's continued presence there.

The debate was sparked by the deaths of seven Israeli soldiers and the wounding of nine others in roadside explosions during the past two weeks in Israel's security zone.

On Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu convened his Inner Security Cabinet for the first of what he said would be a series of discussions about the situation in Lebanon.

Israel has long debated whether to remain in southern Lebanon.

Defenders of the policy say it is necessary to protect Israel's northern settlements until comprehensive agreements are reached with Syria and Lebanon.

Critics of the policy have argued that it only leads to more casualties.

Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday that negotiations with Syria and the hostilities in southern Lebanon were separate issues that must be resolved independently.

"If we link the security situation in Lebanon to negotiations with Syria, our soldiers in Lebanon and Israel's northern border settlements will become hostages to Syria, and targets for terrorist attacks, which will likely increase," he said.

Sharon has previously called for a phased, unilateral withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon, accompanied by a strong warning to Beirut that continued attacks on Israel from its territory would result in the bombardment of essential infrastructure installations.

Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai has been a leading advocate for an Israeli proposal advanced earlier this year that was rejected by Damascus and Beirut.

Canada sends 7 to Washington

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is sending seven delegates – including two well-known Jewish community activists – to this week's historic Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets.

The Canadians will join delegates from 42 countries, including representatives of Jewish organizations and survivor groups, to follow up on last year's London conference on looted Nazi gold.

The Washington meeting, which ends Thursday, will delve into categories that have not been as exhaustively explored as plundered gold or dormant bank accounts – namely, artworks and insurance policies.

Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets

The conference's goals include sharing scholarly research related to Holocaust assets, prodding governments to search and open relevant archives, taking steps to return assets, and advancing Holocaust remembrance and research.

A keynote address is scheduled from U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel will also address delegates.

Special emphasis will be placed on Holocaust education, said delegate Irving Abella, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"At the end of the London conference, it was decided it would be inappropriate to end the 20th century arguing over how to divvy up assets," Abella told The CJN. "So [in Washington], we'll be stressing Holocaust education, using the Holocaust as a metaphor."

The Canadian team is composed of Abella, Rochelle Wilner, a senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, and the following officials and government representatives:

- Howard Strauss of the Oceans, Environment and Economic Law Division of the Department of Foreign Affairs. He will head the Canadian contingent;
- Charles Black, a senior advisor on insurance for the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association;
- Paul Marsden of the National Archives of Canada;
- Susan Murdock of the Department of Canadian Heritage;

The publication, originally called Canadian Jewish Outlook, was founded in Toronto in 1963 as a vehicle for the United Jewish People's Order and other socialist views. It moved to Vancouver in 1979, and continued its strident support for the Israeli peace movement and self-determination for Palestinians, as well as advancing secular, humanistic values.

Rosenthal was born in Russell, Manitoba, and graduated from the University of Toronto. He did graduate studies at the university's school of social work, and went on to direct youth activities at the YMHAs in Winnipeg and Montreal.

He was also a gifted violinist, most recently, with the Kitsilano Trio.

Canada Christian College drops Jewish studies

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada Christian College has agreed to drop its department of Jewish studies following a meeting last week with officials of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Congress had expressed concern that the seven-year-old department was a front to missionize to Jews and to train students to convert Jews to Christianity. [CJN, Nov. 19].

The Toronto Bible school "has agreed to permanently discontinue its department of Jewish studies in all forms," college president Charles McVety told The CJN.

"We want to make it very clear that the Canada Christian College does not approve of or engage in any process to convert Jews to Christianity," McVety added.

The move, however, "is not a very big issue," as the Jewish studies department offered just three of the college's 60 courses, and enrolled about 10 students.

In return for the dropping of the department, CJC has agreed to withdraw a letter it sent recently to Ontario Education minister David Johnson, protesting that an MPP's private members bill was seeking to upgrade the college's status to allow it to grant recognized undergraduate and graduate degrees.

Currently, the college, which enrolls about 150 full- and part-time students, grants only diplomas.

It looks like the bill, drafted by Scarborough Tory MPP Jim Brown, will die before it reaches the legislature, which is scheduled to recess for its winter break soon, McVety said.

He said only one teacher in the department, Malvern Jacobs, "has Jewish origins," and he will be reassigned to other duties.

There are no other courses at the college in missionary work or in ministering to Jews, McVety assured.

In its letter to Johnson, CJC had alleged that a "prime focus" of the college is to proselytize to Jews, and that a number of faculty members had "made a career of focusing on Jews for conversion."

It called on the minister to turn down the college's request to confer degrees.

In a letter to CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy, McVety said the Canada Christian College "is very pro-Israel," and made a sizeable donation to the 1998 UJA campaign.

Landy told The CJN the college was "anxious to please" Congress, and recognized the Jewish community's "serious" concerns about its department of Jewish studies.

The son's burden

The General Assembly of the UJA Federations of North America (GA) that concluded in Jerusalem on Nov. 19 was held in the International Conference Centre (ICC).

The ICC is an impressive building. It strides high atop the very first hillside promontory that comes into view for visitors arriving in Jerusalem from the Tel Aviv highway. Set back many metres from the roadside of Jaffa Street, opposite what used to be the city's central bus station, it is known in Hebrew to most people still as binyanei ha'umah.

It was an appropriate venue for the GA because of the size of its main assembly hall, the size and number of its meeting rooms and the large expanses of its hallways and corridors.

The hallways were important staging areas. Scores of Israeli organizations set up tables, virtually small kiosks, from which they "pitched" their causes and/or their products to the more than 5,000 delegates and others who spent a great deal of time milling about between and during program sessions.

Indeed, the hallways and corridors of the ICC were as vital to the success of the GA as were the meeting rooms and the assembly hall. They were where people met, exchanged business cards, shmoozed, drank coffee together and argued. The hallways were constantly full of people.

On the second full day of the conference, on my way to a session on The Assassination of Yitzhak Rabin: Implications for Israeli Democracy and Israel-Diaspora Relations, I happened to see Yuval Rabin, the late prime minister's son, standing by himself, off to a corner. I approached him, introduced myself and asked if I might briefly interview him. He agreed, but reminded me more than once of my promise to be brief.

Yuval Rabin stands well above six feet, though the full measure of his height is somewhat abated by a slight slouch. He is 43 years old, an engineer.

I was determined not to compare him to his father, not to diminish the son's individuality by measuring it against his parent's stature, but could not avoid doing so.

As a result, I understood that along with the sorrow, the weight of countless unfair comparisons to his father by strangers such as I, are part of Yuval Rabin's burden.

One is immediately struck by the deep traces of his father's face that appear in his own. Yuval has a much softer voice than his father's famous basso profundo. He seemed bashful, at times even uncomfortable answering questions, hardly like his self-assured, confident father.

He was at the GA promoting the cause of Dor Shalom, a grassroots movement founded in the wake of his father's assassination. Rabin is the movement's lay chair.

He described the group as "a social movement based on action, not on words." He sees its main purpose as improving Israeli society through both social action and education.

The group's six-page statement of purpose, which Rabin gave to me so as to avoid having to provide answers that appeared in the written material, is an eloquent call to arms.

"The assassination [of Yitzhak Rabin] cast a heavy shadow on the image of Israeli society. It exposed racism, violence, indifference and alienation, thus leading us to the conclusion that we must act immediately to effect a positive change in Israeli society. We believe that it is incumbent upon each and every one of us to take part in this change.

"Consequently, we have committed ourselves to taking an active part in shaping Israeli society as a community of citizens with equal rights who, together, are building their future and taking responsibility for the situation around them.

"We call upon everyone who deems themselves part of Israeli society, irrespective of gender, religion or nationality, to take part in this change and to act together with us to further the goals of democracy, social justice and peace."

The group campaigned in eight contests in the recently concluded municipal elections. Rabin said they were successful in securing what he referred to as the "education portfolio" in seven of the eight contests for Dor Shalom members.

Their offices are in Tel Aviv, but according to Rabin, they have a "wide presence throughout the country."

In what must have sounded to him like a trite and obviously expected question, I asked Rabin whether he felt the country had changed in the three years since his father's murder.

He answered slowly, thoughtfully, free of any discernible anger or of Pollyanna-like optimism.

"It's too soon to tell," he finally offered. "I'm sure there have been changes, but any evaluations based on my sporadic observations could be distorted by one or another of my experiences. I cannot quantify the changes."

He seemed not to be quite satisfied with this answer. He looked at me; he looked away; then looked at me again. He added to his previous answer: "A lot has changed. Overall, there is more awareness and more caring." But he did not elaborate.

I then asked him if there was any message he would like to impart to the younger generation of Canadian Jews. He had no hesitation.

"Get involved with Israel."

Our interview was over.

Wye's impact on Israeli domestic politics examined

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Is there a new Benjamin Netanyahu... or is there a new post Wye agreement Likud Party?"

That was the provocative question posed at the outset of a speech by guest speaker Dr. David Goldberg, director of research for the Canada-Israel Committee, at the recent Herut-Likud Betar-Tagar general meeting.

Goldberg, who spoke about the impact of the Wye Memorandum on Israeli domestic politics, did not attempt to answer his question directly, but gave varying political interpretations of the agreement. He left audience members to make their own individual judgements on Netanyahu.

Goldberg said the agreement shifted the balance of power among Israeli political parties, and he predicted the change in the political landscape may be more permanent than the Wye agreement.

He said the accord has made for "strange political bed fellows." Many prominent Likud Party MKs have accused Netanyahu of abandoning Likud ideology and have refused to endorse the agreement, so Netanyahu had to rely on Labor Party support to get the accord ratified in the Knesset.

The opposition "had no choice but to support Netanyahu" and pass the bill to avoid a general election, Goldberg said.

"New general elections would have delayed implementation of the Wye agreement. Netanyahu could have blamed Labor for the delay.

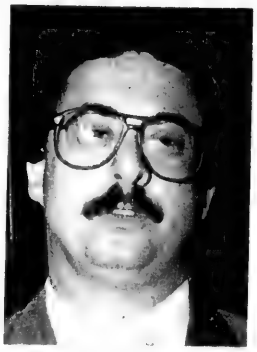
"Netanyahu implemented what Labor would have done in office but at a different pace," he said.

Netanyahu is the first nationalist party leader to give back "although grudgingly" part of "Eretz Yisrael," Goldberg said.

Comparing the Wye agreement to the Camp David accord, he noted that Menachem Begin returned territory to Egypt – the Sinai – which was not historically part of biblical Israel.

Careful not to claim any view as his own, Goldberg presented several opposing political perspectives on why Netanyahu accepted the Wye Memorandum.

He said Netanyahu's supporters claim the prime minister has been a "savior" of the Oslo accords by plugging holes in the original agreement.



Dr. David Goldberg

According to Goldberg, defenders of the government say Netanyahu is holding firm to security measures to ensure that the Palestinian Authority (PA) is in full compliance with Oslo, including the U.S.-verified removal of anti-Israel clauses from the Palestinian national charter.

Netanyahu's supporters argue that he is addressing a widespread desire for the peace process to proceed, "but on better terms" than Oslo, he said.

A second explanation, Goldberg said, attributes Netanyahu's acceptance of Wye to his pragmatism: he needed to address the popular desire for peace as well as abide by Israel's previous international commitments.

He said that, as a pragmatist, Netanyahu had "to strike the best deal possible," since a halt to the peace process might have alienated Israel from its allies in North America and Europe.

Indeed, Goldberg said, the signing of Wye brought $1 billion (US) in American aid into Israeli government coffers, and it enhanced military cooperation between the two countries in the form of a signed memorandum of strategic cooperation.

"Israel has always wanted to be a formal ally of the U.S. This is the closest thing possible... The mutual defence agreement is the best they could have hoped for. Now Israel is assured military support in the long term."

He said the left views Netanyahu's actions as Machiavellian, accusing him of "using the appearance of diplomacy to improve his election prospects in order to get support from the centre of the electorate," which comprises between 30 and 40 percent of the vote.

The left, according to Goldberg, predicts that once re-elected, Netanyahu "will show his true ideological colors and make it impossible for the Palestinians to complete" the peace process.

Other participants in the general meeting included Harry Wolle, president of Herut-Likud Ontario, Baruch Liverant, the new Betar-Tagar shaliach, Sam Shainhouse, national president of Herut-Likud and Nir Katzour from Tagar.

CORRECTION

TORONTO — An article in last week's CJN on the appointment of Norm Cohen as honorary lieutenant-colonel of a Canadian military unit incorrectly stated he had been a Machalnik, or a foreign volunteer in Israel's 1948 war of Independence. In fact, Cohen was, in 1986, a volunteer in Israel's army.

Popular cartoonist honored as JWI Woman of the Year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Lynn Johnston, creator of the comic strip For Better or For Worse, received Jewish Women International of Toronto's (JWI) Woman of the Year Award at the organization's 42nd annual Covenant Breakfast.

The comic strip, which appears in over 1,700 newspapers around the world and has a following of over 100 million readers, highlights the daily life of the Pattersons.

"The daily problems, triumphs, tears and smiles of the Pattersons are situations with which readers readily identify," said Rhonda Groberman, Woman of the Year chair.

"For Better or For Worse touches comic strip readers as few cartoons ever do. Lynn's sterling eye for detail, and her uncanny sense of what real parents and children struggle with daily are a big part of her success. Lynn is a cartoonist who doesn't shrink from controversy, but approaches issues with great thoughtfulness and empathy," she said.

Johnston was the first woman recipient of the Reuben Award for Outstanding Cartoonist of the Year in 1985, and received the award for best syndicated comic strip in 1992. She was also named to the Order of Canada in 1992. In 1994, she was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize, and in 1997, she was inducted into the International Museum of Cartoon Art's Hall of Fame.

Johnston's work exemplifies what JWI works for, said Anna Lee Gould, president JWI Canada. "You continue to strengthen the lives of women, children and families. Through your cartoon strip you have identified issues that families must deal with, and have used your sense of humor to show that everything is relative.

"You remind us that a sense of humor can go a long way in seeing the positive side of most situations. You share our concerns for the well-being of children," she said.

Johnston contributes to many charities near her home in Corbeil, Ont., said Groberman. Her current project is a community centre for high-risk teenagers, called Connections. She and her husband, Rod, are the major supporters of an orphanage in Honduras.

"That is part of the gift, the joy of being given the gift," said Johnston. "The prosperity it has brought can be used in many ways, besides, once in a while, making someone laugh."

Past recipients of the Woman of the Year Award include June Callwood, Dr. Bette Stephenson, Margaret Laurence, Abby Hoffman, Karen Kain, Doreen Wicks, Gerda Frieberg and Vicki Keith.

Thornhill man finds support for new Conservative shul

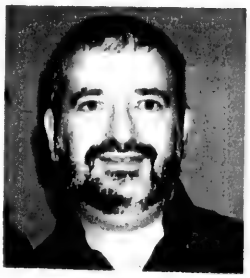
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Cliff Hendler, a Thornhill resident since the late 1980s, has been unhappy for several years over the lack of a neighborhood Conservative synagogue where he, his wife Ellen and their three sons can pray together.

Recently, he decided to take some action. Two weeks ago he ran an ad in The CJN announcing a meeting for those interested in establishing a Conservative synagogue in the area bounded by Dufferin Street, Steeles Avenue, Yonge Street and Highway 7.

It seems he struck a chord. Forty people showed up at his house for an evening meeting last week, filling the combined living room/dining room and spilling out into the hall. Over two dozen more had expressed interest, but couldn't make the meeting, said Hendler.

Currently, the area – where Jews represent about 28 percent of the population – is served by one Reform congregation, about half a dozen Orthodox congregations (including the year-old Sephardic Kehila Centre) and one independent



Cliff Hendler

– B'nai Shalom North Congregation – which defines itself as traditional Conservative, although it currently offers mixed seating only on the High Holy Days.

The Jewish population of greater York Region is well over 45,000, and is expected to grow to over 75,000 by the year 2011, according to a recent UJA Federation study Hendler cited at the meeting. Over 25,000 are between the ages of 30 and 49. Hendler, 45, and the vast majority of those at the meeting also fall into that range.

The consensus – to the extent a consensus is reachable at such a meeting – was that people want a community shul geared to families, and offering equal participation for women in the context of a fairly traditional service.

Hendler, a mediator, made it clear as he chaired the meeting, that he was not there in his professional capacity. The purpose of the initial gathering was to address issues, not resolve them, he said.

For the past year, Hendler has been in contact with representatives of various Conservative synagogues, and with United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (the Conservative umbrella) here and in New York, and with UJA Federation.

He has identified two main issues for the nascent congregation:

- How does the shul get started?
- What type of service do people want?

There are a number of ways a congregation can begin, he said, whether independently, as a satellite of a southern synagogue or by joining forces with an existing synagogue if it moves into the area.

Another variation would be to start independently, but form a "strategic alliance" with an existing synagogue.

Barry Lerner, a vice-president of Beth Sholom Synagogue (which represents a traditional Conservative approach but is not officially affiliated), spoke of the type of assistance his Eglinton Avenue congregation has offered to Beit Rayim Synagogue, an egalitarian Conservative synagogue in Richmond Hill, in areas like joint programming and life cycle events.

A number of members of Beit Rayim were also at the meeting. The congregation will be re-assessing their needs in light of their growing membership, said Rick Goldberger, foundation committee chair.

Meeting attendees discussed whether it would be viable to have two philosophically similar congregations within a short drive from each other.

Other issues included whether there were enough people who would attend weekly services (of those at the meeting, only half are currently affiliated with a synagogue); and the question of who would lead the services.

There were a handful of qualified lay leaders at the meeting, including Hendler.

A core committee that arose from the meeting will meet again next week. For more information, call Hendler at 250-5050 (days) or 905-764-8128 (evenings) or e-mail him at [chendler@shaw.wave.ca].

St. Catharines man honored for info on cemetery vandal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Good Samaritan has reaped a financial reward for his help in bringing an anti-Semitic cemetery vandal to justice.

Canadian Jewish Congress recently presented St. Catharines resident Mark Cross with a cheque for $5,000 for providing police with information leading to the arrest and conviction of Michael Soles, who had knocked over 43 headstones in the city's Jewish cemetery.

Soles was sentenced to 10 months in jail and fined $4,000.

On April 25, Cross woke up and saw a man smashing grave markers in the cemetery across the street from his apartment. He immediately called police and gave them a description of the vandal. He later testified against Soles in court.

During the trial, some spectators gave the Nazi salute, and police escorted Jewish community members to their cars, the St. Catharines Standard reported.

Cross, 20, was presented with the cheque by Michael Soberman, director of community services and youth activities for Congress. "You are an example to all young people," Soberman told Cross. "Your actions demonstrate this type of hate crime will not be tolerated in our community."

Sam Walters, president of Congregation B'Nai Israel, commended the Niagara Regional Police for acting quickly to apprehend Soles.

Awaiting the results

These words are being written merely hours before the people of Quebec elect a new provincial government. Pundits and pollsters have conceded the election to the Parti Québécois (PQ) and its incumbent premier, Lucien Bouchard. Liberal leader Jean Charest has been declared the loser.

If the pre-election polls prove accurate, they will have pointed to the fundamental paradox of the election campaign.

The same polls that confidently predict a PQ victory, assert with equal confidence that less than 44 percent of the voters are in favor of separatism. Thus, a majority of the "soft nationalist" francophone voters, the group to whom both leaders directed their appeals throughout the campaign, were unable, or more precisely, were unwilling to match their political ideology to their political leader.

Bouchard is a committed separatist. And yet, it appears a majority of the "soft" francophone voters willingly ignore his commitment to separation. He openly suggested to voters that he would be willing to renew federalism. Yet how can renewed federalism be compatible with separation? How is renewed federalism compatible with "the winning conditions for the next referendum?" How could Bouchard present a policy of renewed federalism to the rank and file of his party and claim at the same time to be fulfilling their separatist aspirations?

When writers point out these key contradictions in the premier's core policy, he tends to deride them, or as he did last weekend accuse them of deriding him, of demonizing him. "I am not the great Satan," the premier said, knowing that no one had actually said that of him.

Whatever the outcome of the election, federalists will have a great deal of work to do and a great number of difficult decisions to make actually and truly trying to renew federalism.

But, as logic and experience suggest, that can only be done with people and leaders who believe in federalism, who, in short, believe in Canada.

We await the results of the election.

The Lords' law

Some weeks ago in this space, we condemned the decision by Great Britain's High Court of Justice that quashed the arrest warrants issued against former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet. He had been arrested in Britain at the request of the Spanish government. "How can conscience acquiesce to the notion that committing atrocities or ordering genocide are protected activities of a head of state?" we asked.

Apparently, the collective conscience of the highest appeal court in Britain, the House of Lords, could not acquiesce to the notion either. In a 3-2 decision last week, the Lords overturned the High Court ruling and decided that Pinochet should be compelled to submit to the due process of the extradition hearings being requested by the Spanish government.

Speaking for the majority, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said: "International law recognizes, of course, that the function of a head of state may include activities which are wrongful, even illegal, by the law of his own state or by the laws of other states. But international law has made plain that certain types of conduct, including torture and hostage-taking, are not acceptable conduct on the part of anyone. This applies as much to heads of state, or even more so, as it does to everyone else.

"The contrary conclusion would make a mockery of international law."

The question of Pinochet's actual extradition to Spain now reverts to the Home Secretary, Jack Straw. But at least there is an unequivocally authoritative statement of law dispelling the proposition that torture and genocide are protected activities of a head of state.

JF&CS help to homeless is open policy

Re: Ron Csillag's (CJN, Nov. 12) article regarding Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS). The article describes an initiative by freelance social worker Lillian Freedman, with the support of JF&CS, to locate and assist homeless Jews in Toronto.

In fact JF&CS does serve the homeless. The agency provides a wide range of services to assist and support the most vulnerable and disenfranchised of Toronto's Jewish community. In the past six months, with reference to homelessness, JF&CS has helped 45 persons, providing counseling, money and assistance in locating and securing accommodations. Of these individuals, 10 were new clients, 10 were re-opened as clients due to a housing crisis, and 25 were clients with whom the agency maintained ongoing contact. Our case-workers indicate that 21 of these individuals were homeless and living in shelters, transitional houses, or in the case of one person, a car. Two individuals were homeless after lengthy hospitalizations, and two left their homes due to violent domestic situations. Eight individuals were about to be evicted.

Freedman's concerns regarding JF&CS' guidelines constricting support to the homeless are not accurate or consistent with the agency's commitment to and record of social responsibility. As a community agency, JF&CS has a board of directors representing a cross section of Jewish Toronto. Our programs are developed in response to community need and with the community's participation and collaboration. Ours is an inclusive process, not one characterized by closed doors, as Freedman suggests.

Supplementary schools have role to play

I noted your article (CJN, Nov. 19), headed "Rabbi questions the value of supplementary Hebrew school."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl stipulates greater emphasis should be put on Hebrew day schools instead of supplementary schools. While his point of view is both commendable and understandable, until such time as all Jewish parents, with or without community support, can afford to send their children to day schools, there is a role for supplementary schools – albeit a limited one.

Further, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, out of its 1997-98 provision of $7,536,207 for Jewish education, allocated less than $100,000 to supplementary schools — an amount substantially less and disproportionate than that allocated to day schools when one compares the number of supplementary and day school students.

Men are also subject to spousal abuse

Re: Article by Carolyn Blackman on spouse abuse (CJN, Nov. 5).

I contend that men abused are more ashamed to seek professional help from local agencies, and their plight, though severe, is often less noticed.

It is true that male muscle can become life threatening. It is equally true that a woman's sharp tongue-lashing can be as castrating as a surgeon's knife.

A Yiddish proverb says: "A patch forgeyt, ober a vort shteyt." A blow may sometimes be less wounding than a verbal diatribe. Both are demeaning slaps in the face.

Physical and emotional abuse, therefore, is not exclusive to one gender.

Israel not given to Jews on a silver platter

Re the article by Frances Kraft on Rabbi Benito Garzon's visit to Toronto (CJN, Nov. 12).

The rabbi stated in his lecture that Israel does not enjoy real Jewish identity.

To my question about this, the rabbi gave this explanation: God gave Israel to the Jewish people in a hurry on a silver platter. It was only three years after the Holocaust. It took the Israelites, who came out of bondage from Egypt, 40 years to forget that we were slaves.

Permit me to respond. We fought hard against all odds for our country. No one gave it to us on a silver platter. We lost thousands of young and old men and women prior to and following the establishment of Israel. Since then, we withstood a number of wars to secure and safeguard this little piece of land.

Every Jew worldwide must be aware by now, I hope, of the concrete and crucial fact that Israel was not given to us on any kind of platter. And no one should forget that we fought with our flesh and blood, and paid dearly to achieve Israel's independence. Unfortunately, we are still at it with the hope of securing real peace with the Arabs.

Netanyahu's first withdrawal

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

A new term has been added to the semantic creations that have accompanied the peace process. The "security suit" refers to the winding fences, cement trenches, watchtowers and masses of soldiers whose job it is to insulate the settlements from the Palestinian enemy.

This new security zone, its modern wall and tower, and "Jewish enclaves" is a brand-new geopolitical reality in the territories. It turns out that it's impossible to create Palestinian enclaves in order to smash the possibility of Palestinian territorial contiguity, without creating Jewish enclaves cut off from the rest of the country.

And there will be more of these enclaves, like Kadim and Ganim, as the withdrawal continues into the second redeployment and then the third, so that in the next three months the IDF will have to tailor several dozen of these new "security suits."

The settlers know very well what life is going to be like inside these pressure suits: the waiting for a military convoy to shuttle them back and forth, in and out of the enclave; the increased presence of soldiers in small civilian settlements; the frequent Palestinian roadblocks; and the deliberation before every trip outside the settlement.

What appears reasonable on colorful maps, becomes unreasonable in reality. Some have already announced plans to return to Israel. What bothers them is not the nearby Arabs, but life inside a fortress. Others, who gave up the safe haven of Israel – or didn't save enough to buy one – will have to wait for their chance.

Until then, they can join the hard core ideological centre of the settlement movement that will continue to fight the security agreement and peace that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu brought back from Washington.

That's the real meaning of Netanyahu's first withdrawal, even if its official title is the second withdrawal. From now on, this is the Oslo of Netanyahu, the prime minister of Israel, not Netanyahu the representative of the settlers.

He can take pride in his achievements: the anti-incitement decree that he squeezed out of Arafat; the arrest of the terror suspects that have already been captured; the renewed fight of the Palestinian Authority (PA) against the Hamas; and if indeed the PLO charter is annulled, he can claim that, too, as an impressive achievement.

In practice, Netanyahu improved certain aspects of the Oslo accords. Make fun of how the right-wing ideology was stunned, if you want. But it wasn't the first time.

Netanyahu may or may not keep his word on this agreement. His representatives will try to steal another bit of road or prevent the handing over of another little dunam. And that also won't be for the first time. But Netanyahu's Oslo has already succeeded where others have failed.

He has driven a wedge between the settlers and themselves.

He's returned the settlement movement to its first days, when there was a clear distinction between those settlers who were God's very own messengers on earth, and those who simply wanted a better standard of living. The security suits that he's promising the settlers won't fit both kinds of settlers.

The settlement leadership already understands that it will have to decide what's more important – more settlers on less land, or a desperate race for ideology.

Should they wear the security suits as a guarantee of remaining on the land, or reject the suit because it will force the departure of the ideological soldiers of the movement?

Netanyahu's agreements have created the real paradox: If the settlers give up their homes because the Palestinian border is so close, it will mean they've given up their argument of coexistence that they've clung to for so long, in order to prove their settlements are not obstacles to peace.

But if they stay, it will be proof that the dreaded peace process is, in fact, much more vital than they want to admit, swiping the rug out from under their ideological feet.

And the dilemma at the end of the road contains a far more fundamental question: won't the security argument turn into the pin that punctures the ideological balloon? Because you can't demand that the IDF stay in order to protect the land, and at the same time reject the IDF because it makes life uncomfortable for the settlers. And when the security argument is no longer in force, all that's left is a stark naked ideology.

An Israeli wrapped in his prayer shawl shows his pistol as an armed Israeli soldier stands nearby during a morning prayer vigil in which some 50 settlers blocked a main road at sunrise. Settlers say this move was the beginning of an intensive protest campaign against any new peace deal with the Palestinians.

Making connection with history

Show, don't tell. Various members of the journalism faculty drilled this into my head a hundred times last year. A good story shows the reader what is happening instead of a mere repetition of what has happened. That is what ran through my mind as I sat for three hours watching three student-produced plays about the Holocaust.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Traces is a set of three plays by Ida Fink, a Holocaust survivor now living in Israel. The plays, produced by the King's Theatrical Society (KTS) and the Contemporary Studies Program, were performed at King's as a commemoration of the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

The plays were also part of the Terezin Studio Project. The project, which was in Halifax from early September to mid-November, is a collection of films, art, lectures and theatre about Theresienstadt, a concentration camp in Czechoslovakia.

Theresienstadt, or Terezin, was set up to be the model Jewish ghetto as a method of propaganda. Jews in this camp were "encouraged" to show off their artistic abilities, in order to make the Nazis look good.

Much of the art in the Terezin Studio Project comes from Jews who were in the concentration camp.

The plays produced by the KTS, and the other events of the Terezin Studio Project, are an embodiment of the journalism school's "show don't tell" mantra. History can be taught in many different ways. Through lectures or trips to museums, students can learn about what happened to who, and why. But teaching history through art adds another dimension – an emotional connection between the event and the audience.

The three plays in Traces – The Table, Traces and A Description of a Morning, each tell the story of a different aspect of the Holocaust.

In A Description of a Morning, a husband and wife are hiding in an attic during the war. Both are attempting to come to terms with the death of their daughter. The wife is overwhelmed by the tragedy and can hardly function, while the husband attempts to erase it from his mind, concentrating on Latin verbs and finding new ways to describe a beautiful day.

Traces, takes place two years after the liberation of the camps. A young woman searches for her sister, who was sent to a small Polish community to hide. No one seems to know what happened to the 12 year-old girl and everyone just wants to forget the last few years.

The Table is the furthest removed, timewise, from the horrors in Europe. A lawyer interviews four survivors from the same town, in hopes that one of them can help him with a trial against war criminals.

However, after more than 20 years, no one can say for certain that they saw any murders, though they all know that 800 people died in one day.

As I sat in the Pit, the old King's Chapel basement that now houses all KTS productions, watching mostly Christian students reenact one of the most painful topics of the 20th century, I was proud of my school. Though the Jewish population is growing, I think of King's as an Anglican influenced institution. It's hard to forget that King's used to be a divinity school when the bell in the chapel rings three times a day to announce services.

Watching the plays was a draining experience. At some points I didn't want to watch what they were showing me, I just wanted to go home.

I believe in "Never Forget" so I continued to watch, as did the students and Haligonians who attended the performances.

Learning the historic dates and statistics is necessary. So is making a connection with history. When someone is brave enough to show you, through a painting or a poem or a play, the impact of a world-altering event, you watch.

Countdown to the winter break

The student body is bundling up. For the past month meteorologists, professors and politicians have each been hanging black clouds over our heads.

Erica Horn in Montreal

The meteorologists have been urging us never to leave home without our boots, mitts, neck-warmers, scarves, hats and winter coats. Five centimetres of snow they threaten. Brace yourselves!

The professors have unloaded the last of our assignments, before we hibernate for exam period into the high stacks of notes, stencils and textbooks. Those of us who are not afraid of large, dark and unfriendly libraries have been encouraged to pack lunches (and in some cases breakfasts and dinners too) and head to the library starting now. What's the rush?

All the promises and cutthroat threats thrown from one party to the other during the provincial election campaign has made me sick of reading the newspapers and watching the news. No one can get his or her story straight.

It's a confusion of he said, she said, hearsay.

Students can't trust anyone these days. Where's our snow? Ever since I started wearing my big bright purple puffy jacket to school, no one can sit directly next to me because I take up too much space. (I have never had that problem before!) In a nutshell, the meteorologist has not only made me seem anti-social, but has led students to be weary of every step they take outside of their home or the library. (Do we really need extra stress?)

Tomorrow morning we could wake up and hear them announcing another ice storm and a lot of us would have trouble believing the announcer. I am sure most of us have read the story, The Boy Who Cried Wolf, haven't they?

Students expecting a short repose before finals were expecting too much. I am finding myself going to bed later and later, and rubbing my eyes more and more from sitting in front of my computer screen. One more 20-page paper may impair my vision forever! Now, maybe this is all due to the extra time it takes me to get dressed to venture into the great cold outdoors, but that is unlikely.

I am not a big fan of the library. It houses dust, darkness and people who appear far more serious than I do – and that makes me nervous. I prefer studying in the comfort of my own home, where the distractions of e-mail, the phone and food are readily at hand. I am not a big eater, but I like to know that if I want a distraction, it is right near by and not six floors away.

Will or won't there be another referendum? It seemed that if we were to sound a bell every time the word "referendum" was mentioned during the election campaign that we would need an air raid siren to sound indefinitely.

I must have been fooled by the name "election campaign" – I thought we were supposed to elect a new premier of Quebec. I am not a politics person. I have my views and I knew who I wanted to vote for (and, okay, I tried to persuade others to vote the same), but I don't care much for the politics of politics. It is too much for me. No one sticks to what they say, no one remembers what they said and still, no one stops saying.

Look outside your windows. Watch students heading to school. They should look warm, tired and confused. What we have needed in the past month is a direct line to the weather centre, eye drops and earplugs. All we have received is a meteorologist who must be watching weather maps from last January, professors who are determined to have us work for their money and politicians... actually, I don't really know what they were doing.

It's no wonder the students have started bundling up. I'm scared to roll out of bed in the morning. The television, radio, newspaper, computer and even the walk to the bus are newly found hazards to my health. Countdown to winter break has begun!

How old is John Glenn?

I admit freely that the space flight of Sen. John Glenn has been for me – as for many others in my age group – an uplifting and encouraging experience. After all, the senator is chronologically 77 years old, and became a member of Discovery crew despite some vigorous objections.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Those who opposed his participation were of the opinion that anyone of that age was unfit to withstand the rigors of space flight, while Glenn himself and those who took his side, asserted that it was important to find out just what – if anything – this kind of experience would do to his body. In other words, he would be the first in a series of experiments that would determine whether bone loss, for instance, which seems to affect all astronauts, is somehow related to the natural bone loss of aging people. In time we will, of course, hear how scientists evaluate the findings that will come out of the flight of Discovery – but meanwhile, for me at least, Glenn has defied a good many of the stereotypical presuppositions that are coursing through the public mind.

For the public considers chronological age to be a good measurement of what a person is like. After reaching 65, one is generally pronounced unfit for work; society adopts a rejectionist attitude, and considers chronological age to yield definitive measurements.

But there is also biological age, which is another way of saying that each person ages differently: some more quickly, some more slowly. Having been in the United States during the flight, I was a happy witness to the excitement that attended Glenn's venture. Suddenly, older people came out of the closet and admitted that they had long felt discriminated against, rejected and otherwise demeaned because of their chronological years. In Winnipeg too, I understand, older people gathered and watched the launching of Discovery, cheering every moment of it. They, like many others of their age group, identified with the senator.

It happens that I am in the midst of writing a book about being old and have become all too aware of the discrimination that my age group suffers – in language, in economic fact and a dozen other ways. Above all, older people want to be recognized as individuals. In Winnipeg, one participant shouted: "He shows that he is still a person," and that is the sense that others shared in spades.

Getting old has its problems, even as it has its advantages, and I hope to talk about it in greater detail in my book. But meanwhile, hurray for Glenn who has fulfilled an ambition at a time in life when people are said to have no ambition at all because they are believed to be incapable of experiencing the ordinary sentiments that others have.

We oldsters are a large part of the population and our percentage will grow with every decade. Glenn has given all of us a boost, and I hope has instructed those still young, that old age is not to be feared, despised or otherwise looked to as a time of grief, agony and final decline. It can also be, and for many of us is, a time of fulfillment of many hopes, and Glenn has earned our gratitude for showing that it can indeed be so.

The Kirshner File

A life blemished by anti-Semitism

Ernest Sirluck, a Jewish boy from Winkler, Manitoba, has left his mark in the sand, but at some cost to himself.

He was the first Jew to be appointed to a department of English literature in a Canadian university. Later, he was graduate dean and vice-president of the University of Toronto, then president of the University of Manitoba.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It sounds as if he had a charmed life. But that is not exactly the truth. A child of his times, Sirluck was dogged by anti-Semitism from his youth in the Prairies to his adulthood in Toronto.

Reading through the lines of First Generation (University of Toronto Press), his candid autobiography, one can only conclude that his bouts with blatant and subtle bigotry had an ambivalent effect on him.

On the one hand, the sting of being singled out for opprobrium made him tougher and stronger. On the other hand, this endemic anti-Semitism induced a kind of self-hatred, a not uncommon phenomenon.

Born in 1918, Sirluck grew up in a predominantly German Mennonite village, the son of Isaac and Ruchel. Isaac, who immigrated to Canada by way of Britain and Argentina, was an itinerant pedlar, a partner in a general store and a foreman on a farm owned by Yosel Nitikman, his father-in-law.

From 1923 to 1930, Winkler's Jewish population was big enough to support a synagogue and a cantor who doubled as a teacher and a butcher. During this period, Sirluck got his first whiff of anti-Semitism when he was jeered and physically attacked. He fought back, but to little avail. And, as he admits, he had to struggle with self-abnegation.

Winkler was affected by the rise of National Socialism in Germany, being "a fertile ground for Nazi propaganda."

Sirluck presumes that its churches and Sunday schools probably did not pass on Nazi racial dogma, but he accuses them of having condoned it and of having left the indelible impression that Jews crucified Jesus.

He recalls that a number of families in Winkler subscribed to Nazi publications, and that one of them, the operators of the telephone exchange, pasted sheets of Der Sturmer and Volkischer Beobachter – two of the most loathsome newspapers of the genre – in the windows fronting Main Street. With good reason, Sirluck is still outraged by the fact that the provincial government voiced no objection to these obscene displays.

Winkler, too, had a flourishing branch of the fascist Canadian Nationalist party, which was affiliated with Adrien Arcand's Blue Shirts in Quebec. Sirluck was badly shaken when he discovered that someone whom he liked and trusted was president of the local chapter.

As if to soothe his feelings, Sirluck's friend said, "There's nothing personal in it, and I hope we can stay friends." But he would have none of that. "I never spoke to him again," he writes. "I never fully got over the pain of the betrayal." And in a menacing aside, he adds: "It was one of the sharpest and most hurtful lessons I ever received about how precarious the friendship of a gentile for a Jew can be."

Having graduated from high school, Sirluck went to Winnipeg to attend the University of Manitoba. "At the university," he observes disconcertingly, "I soon found that although anti-Semitism was not as crude and overt as in Winkler it was nevertheless widespread and institutionalized."

There was a Jewish quota at the medical school. The faculty of engineering discouraged Jewish students. There was a glaring absence of Jewish teachers. Fraternities and sororities were segregated.

Not being able to accept the status quo, Sirluck joined a Jewish fraternity and the Menorah Society (a discussion group). But in the classroom, library, common room, and off campus, he cultivated friendships with Jews and non-Jews alike.

Finishing his BA degree, Sirluck realized that his desire to become a professor of English had hardened into an intention. But there was a problem, as his advisor pointed out. Would he be able to find a university job? It was not an idle question, since there were no Jewish professors of English in Canada at the time. Sirluck was willing to take the risk. "I was determined to try."

In 1940, he enrolled for postgraduate studies at the University of Toronto. When he registered, he wrote "none" in the space for religion because he thought that the question was "improper and potentially discriminatory," and because he felt free "to pick and choose what I would observe."

Having declared himself irreligious, Sirluck applied for the Leonard Fellowship and scholarships, which were restricted to "white, Protestant, Christian, British Canadian students." His application was rejected. "Someone must have informed the school that I was Jewish," he notes.

Years later, as a senior administrator at the University of Toronto, Sirluck called for the removal of all restrictive clauses in awards. The motion passed, but the Leonard Foundation refused to comply. In 1982, after 20 years of fruitless negotiations, the university finally dropped the foundation's awards.

When Sirluck enrolled in a Canadian army course for non-commissioned officers, he again wrote "none" for religion. The officer in charge said, "You have to have a religion." Sirluck explained that if he fell into German hands during combat, the word "Jew" on his name-tag would be a distinct disadvantage. The officer suggested a compromise of sorts: "C of E," or Church of England.

Personally speaking, I cringed when I read this passage.

As it happened, Sirluck needn't have worried about being captured by the Wehrmacht. As a Jewish officer in the Canadian forces, he was the butt of prejudice, coming in for "gratuitous criticism" and being subjected to "extra duties (especially latrine assignments) and punishment drills."

Despite these indignities, he served his country well in Europe.

Before leaving Canada, he married Lesley McNaught, a Protestant whose Baptist father was an agnostic and whose mother had been raised as a Presbyterian. Isaac Sirluck, however, insisted on a Jewish wedding. A compromise was struck when it was decided that there would be two ceremonies: a Jewish service conducted by a Conservative rabbi, David Monson, in his home, and a Christian service presided over by an Anglican minister at the university's Hart House Chapel. His best man was Claude Bissell, a future president of the University of Toronto.

Returning to Toronto from battle in 1945, Sirluck began teaching at University College. Subsequently, he received job offers from Queen's University and the University of Western Ontario. In the end, he opted for his alma mater, the University of Toronto. The barriers had fallen.

Yet, much to his disgust, he could not rent a flat in Toronto. "We don't take Jews," the superintendent said. "I thought of making an issue of it but couldn't see how to do it," he writes.

Even in the 1960s, with anti-discrimination laws in place throughout Canada, Sirluck ran headlong into anti-Semitism. The York Club, a snobbish Anglo-Saxon bastion, rejected his membership application. By then, he was a high-ranking official at the University of Toronto.

During the 1970s, when he was president of the University of Manitoba, associates wanted him to join the Manitoba Club, which had a policy of excluding Jews. Knowing this, Sirluck declined.

Once bitten, twice shy.

Maccabees' message

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

I once heard a rabbi tell a priest that Jews have a problem marketing Chanukah. The rabbi continued by saying that since Chanukah and Christmas were in such close proximity to each other, Chanukah would always be dimmed by Christmas.

According to this rabbi, "how can one compare singing Silent Night with singing Dreidel Dreidel Dreidel?"

It is unfortunate, that in some spheres of the Jewish community, holidays are seen as marketing opportunities, and are then compared with the "competition."

Other people believe Chanukah to be a children's holiday. The lighting of the candles commemorates the miracle of oil that lasted eight days. These people believe this to be a lovely fairy tale that will excite the imaginations of children, but will not have meaning to rational adults.

Still others will extol the military aspect of the holiday and how the Jewish people were able to overcome the odds. A tiny army, ill-equipped and out-numbered, was able to defeat the enemy. Through war, we were able to secure both religious and political autonomy. According to this view, this is the miracle of Chanukah.

Yet, why would we light candles for eight days to commemorate a war that lasted far longer? And what connection can there be between lighting candles and winning a war?

The one thing that becomes evident about Chanukah through all these views, is that it is a multi-faceted holiday. It stresses unity of peoplehood and balance of gender. All the people are fighting toward a common cause.

Judah the Maccabee led the army while Judith waged a smaller battle with a general. While the men are fighting at the front lines, the women and children are fighting in the cities through non-compliance with the enemy's decrees. It is truly a victory that celebrates the joint efforts of all factions of the Jewish people.

Yet, beyond this lies the subtleties of Chanukah. The Talmud describes the miracle surrounding the oil, and the eight days it burned. However, a midrash introduces a more subtle connection to the number eight. According to this midrash, we light eight candles to commemorate what the Hasmoneans did when they first entered the Temple.

Upon entering, the Hasmoneans found eight iron spears. They stuck the heads of the spears into the ground to anchor them, and made grooves into the bottoms which were now facing up. The Hasmoneans proceeded to pour oil into the grooves, lay wicks in the oil and light these spears.

The message is a beautiful one that speaks to both the child and the adult. Once the battles were over, the Hasmoneans turned the weapons they found into peaceful objects. Instruments that were once used to kill, were now used to bring light into a holy place.

As we light the candles this year, among the other concepts surrounding Chanukah, it would be appropriate to remember this midrash. While the holiday does celebrate a military victory, it also commemorates our objectives for peace. The Jewish goal is not to win the battle, so much as it is to never have to fight.

Chanukah gelt traditions

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's one of the most popular traditions of one of the most well-known holidays of the year. But the authentic reasons behind the giving of Chanukah gelt can leave most people scratching their heads. Today some Chanukah gelt traditions from the Jewish Highway.

Ohr Somayach explains that Chanukah gelt is a Jewish custom rooted in the Talmud. "The Talmud states that even a very poor person must light Chanukah lights, even if he can't afford it. A person with no money is required to go 'knocking on doors' until he collects enough to buy at least one candle for each night of Chanukah. The Torah concept of charity – tzedakah – requires us to help the recipient in the most dignified manner possible. Therefore, the custom arose to give gifts of money during Chanukah so that someone who needs extra money for Chanukah candles can receive it in the form of 'Chanukah Gelt.'" [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask173.htm#Q5].

Eliezer Siegel traces the evolution of the tradition in Gelt to Gifts: A Chanukah Journey [http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/961121_Geltl.html]. Because of the similarities of the words "Chanukah" (dedication) and "Chinuch" (education), some Jewish communities used the Chanukah season as the time to honor their religious teachers and students.

In 18th century Eastern Europe, rabbis toured outlying villages during Chanukah to strengthen the townsfolk's Jewish education. Initially, these rabbis would decline payment. But eventually they would accept tokens of appreciation for lost time. In time, these gifts, or gelt, became almost obligatory to the rabbis, to other pillars of the community, and in the 19th century, to children. Other traditions of giving coins or small gifts to kids have also been found in Persia, Yemen and pre-State of Israel Palestine.

Siegel concludes his essay with this comment: "Needless to say, an immense gulf separates the customs described here from the shopping frenzy that is associated with the North American Chanukah." If you do opt to give gifts, JewishFamily.com has some suggestions to keep your spending and nerves under control [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=587].

Instead of trying compete with the seasonal frenzy, Lisa Traiger says you should look for low-key Jewish-oriented gifts to bring Chanukah – and your kids – back to their roots. Some suggestions: Jewish books, music, dreidels, puzzles, crafts, and of course, gelt.

Nowadays, most gelt exchanged at Chanukah isn't made of genuine gold or silver but of chocolate. Many of our fond memories for those bags of coins can be traced to Israel's Elite chocolate company which has an impressive Hebrew-only Web site [http://www.elite.co.il/]. But if you want to establish a new gelt tradition, how about creating A Chanukah Gelt Chocolate Fudge Cake? [http://dco.webpoint.com/holiday/_vti_bin/shtml.exe/h_geltca.htm/map]

This is a luscious chocolate cake topped off with glittering gold foil-covered chocolate coins. Sounds good but just not decadent enough?

Then try out the Chanukah Gelt Double Fudge Chocolate Layer Cake [http://www.better-baking.com/baker2/seasonal2chglt.html]. Of course, you do have eight days to finish them off but that shouldn't be a problem.

Next week, we'll continue our look at coins, the real kind, as we survey sites for ancient Jewish and modern Israeli numismatics.

Syria's Jewish community

By JACQUES SAYEGH

The Jewish presence in Syria dates back to biblical times and it is intertwined with the history of Jews in neighboring Eretz Yisrael.

With the advent of Christianity, restrictions were imposed on the community. The Arab conquest in 636 CE, however, greatly improved the lot of the Jews. Unrest in neighboring Iraq, in the 10th century, resulted in Jewish migration to Syria, and brought about a boom in commerce, banking and crafts.

During the reign of the Fatimids, the Jew Menashe Ibrahim El-Kazzaz ran the Syrian administration and he granted Jews positions in the government.

During the 11th century, Jews were concentrated in Damascus and Aleppo. They produced many scholars, among them Baruch Ben Isaac, and poets who wrote in Hebrew.

The Mameluke period (1260-1516) was a difficult time for the Jews, and many were forced to convert to Islam. When the country was taken over by the Ottomans, the lot of the Jews improved markedly. A large influx of Spanish Jews arrived, mainly from Italy and Turkey.

The infamous Damascus Blood Libel of 1840 was the first of its kind in the Muslim Arab world. The Jews were accused of killing a Catholic priest who had disappeared, and of using his blood for the Passover matzot. Only foreign political intervention together with international Jewish advocacy liberated the falsely accused Jews.

In 1954, some Jews were permitted to leave on condition that they relinquish their property. In 1964, the situation worsened and Jews were forbidden to move beyond a three-kilometre distance from their city.

Following the exposure of the Israeli spy, Eli Cohen, and the Six Day War, the situation deteriorated. Waves of violence erupted and Jews were attacked, arrested and murdered.

In 1968, there were an estimated 4,500 Jews living in Syria, 3,700 in Damascus, 700 in Aleppo and 100 in Kamishli.

For the next decades, Syrian Jews were, in effect, hostages of a hostile regime. They could leave Syria only on condition that they leave members of their family behind. The community lived under siege, constantly under surveillance by the secret police. This much was allowed due to an international effort to secure the human rights of the Jews, the changing world order, and the Syrian need for Western support, so the conditions of the Jews improved somewhat.

The year 1992 was the turning point for the Jewish community. North American and Israeli pressure succeeded in convincing the Syrian government to declare that Jews could leave freely. Many Syrian Jews were rescued by Judy Feld Carr. Since 1992, nearly all of the Jews have left; 3,565 immigrated to the United States and the rest went to Israel.

And baby makes three

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to the CJN

Milestones can do funny things to people. Take children, for instance. My wife and I welcomed Nathan – our first – into the world last February 26. Naturally, we consider it a monumental event.

It's also big news for Nathan's extended family.

Being the first grandchild, and among the first of his generation, in both our families, this kid fulfils a great deal of pent up demand for grandchildren and nieces and nephews.

During the pregnancy, normally staid grandparents-in-waiting became irrational recession-busters scouring South Florida – South Florida before the age of 60?– for clothing bargains.

Never mind the Jewish tradition of not buying for an unborn child – bad luck and all. Superstition falls by the wayside when irrational excitement rules the day.

On a cold January afternoon – about one month before B-day – I got the call.

It was my father on his cellphone from a Target department store in West Palm Beach. What could he possibly need to know that necessitated a $40 long distance call in the middle of the day on his Canadian-registered wireless, I asked myself?

"Mummy – you know how good a bargain hunter she is – she's found some sleepers and undershirts for the baby for $2.99. Is that a good price? Should we get a bunch?" he asked.

Leaving aside for the moment the embarrassing question of why my father and I still refer to my mother in the third person as "mummy," my dad missed the irony that they would need to buy 20 clothing items for the savings to compensate for the call.

The episode was a harbinger of things to come.

After the baby's birth, my wife and I continued our erev Shabbat tradition of dinner at my parents. What was once a restful end-of-week event – a mechayeh to use my dad's expression – became a veritable mob scene as my parents, brother and sister (a second sister missed Nathan's birth, as a student at Hebrew University) took weekly leave of their usually reliable senses to take turns arguing over who was going to hold the baby.

God forbid a guest were to come over, adding an extra person to duel for a two-month-old's attention. A guest's best strategy – if they could handle the jealous stares once they managed to tear the baby from someone's arms – would be to snatch him between courses as the family was momentarily distracted with clearing the table.

Though a very easygoing guy, only now, in his tenth month, can Nathan handle the weekly barrage.

Of course, getting out once and a while is often the only thing standing between the rookie parent and the abyss of a nervous breakdown – never mind marital friction.

So, on a summertime trip to Ottawa as part of Nathan's Great Eastern Canadian Tour (to Ottawa and Montreal – call The CJN for the official t-shirt), we took the plunge and went to – get ready for it – a movie.

Entrusting my in-laws with the baby (not that we actually trusted them, having only raised three children between them), we left for three hours of sheer celluloid bliss. The movie, Warren Beatty's Bulworth, was mediocre, but, emboldened, the next day we went out again, this time shopping. Thank God for small pleasures.

Just don't tell my parents (and leave it to me to rip this page from their issue of The CJN): we've let them think they were the first ones to babysit.

Actually, their first adventure in babysitting – after three months of none-too-subtle hints regarding their virtual 24 hour, seven day availability – was the first time we dared venture to an evening movie.

I called my parents at 5:50 p.m. on a Sunday, awakening my father from a nap.

"We think we'd like to go to an early show, but we need you here before 6:30," I said.

"We'll be there," said my dad, dispensing with his usual custom of clearing all decisions, large and small, with my mother.

Breaking personal land speed records, at 6:15, my parents, who live on Toronto's northern border, were on our doorstep at the edge of downtown. It's a trip that normally takes them 45 minutes, in light traffic no less.

After we returned, my mom commented on Nathan's good behavior and how much fun my parents had playing with him.

"He gets so much attention," she added. "What a shock for him it will be when he gets a sibling."

We rolled our eyes, and, with my parents safely on their way home, we gave our first kid a bath.

Roots & Remembrance

The Lithuanian horror

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Two Jewish genealogists, one from England and one from Israel, have joined forces to compile a comprehensive list of the roughly 200,000 to 240,000 Jews from Lithuania who perished in the Holocaust.

Saul Issroff, a semi-retired dermatologist from London, travelled to Lithuania last year and visited about 80 shtetls that once held Jewish populations.

"The names of the people are unknown – they haven't been collected," he said. "There are about 250 sites of mass murder recorded in Lithuania, but no one has attempted to make a comprehensive list of the people who were killed."

Both Issroff and his partner in the project, Rose Lerer Cohen, a resident of Jerusalem, were born in South Africa to families that had emigrated there from Lithuania. Several years ago, Issroff discovered that he had many relatives who perished in the Holocaust. "This was never discussed in my family. Part of the reason I'm doing this is because I want to find the names of my relatives."

To date, they have collected more than 80,000 names with the help of Jewish institutions such as Yad Vashem, YIVO and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Other names have come from the Israeli-based Association of Lithuanian Jews and the Kibbutz of the Ghetto Fighters Museum, also in Israel.

The pair have also extracted names from a collection of about 20 yizkor or memorial books that have been published on Lithuania locales, as well as from the Litvak SIG, a special interest group of genealogical researchers focusing on Lithuania.

The state-run Jewish museum in Vilna informed them of a census done in the Vilna ghetto in 1943, which contained about 15,300 names. Another list for the Kovno ghetto added 14,000 more names, while a third list for the Siauliai ghetto produced another 5,000 names.

According to Issroff, another potential source of names is the Soviet Extraordinary Commission into German War Crimes, a postwar attempt by the Soviets to document Nazi atrocities. "We've also found KGB lists, some of them from Lithuania," he said. "We believe there are a lot more that we don't have access to."

So far, Issroff and Cohen have acquired information relating to the mass murder of Jews in almost 100 Lithuanian towns. "We're going to create a database and hopefully publish a memorial book in a few years," he said.

They are appealing to the public to supply names and other information on Lithuanian Jews who perished in the Holocaust. To fill in a form, contact Dr. Saul Issroff, 29c Elsworthy Rd., London, NW3 3BT; or email [saul@swico.demon.co.uk]. In Israel, contact Rose Lerer Cohen, P.O. Box 11456, Jerusalem 91114; email [roseron@shani.net].

Seek and thou shalt find, advises the Biblical homily, and some genealogists discover the truth of this only months after they begin to search for their ancestry.

These are the lucky few who find that someone has already done a significant amount of research for them. The material inevitably sits in some far-off institution, awaiting only their requests by inter-library loan.

Many thousands of Jewish family trees are already in print in libraries and archives around the world. Many more have received significant attention in journals and private papers.

How to locate materials that might pertain to your family? One way is to consult The Sourcebook for Jewish Genealogies and Family Histories, by David S. Zubatsky and Irwin M. Brent.

At 456 pages, this useful reference work offers more than 22,000 entries pertaining to some 12,000 family names, culled from a variety of primary sources: books, newspapers and journals, Jewish encyclopedias, family papers and other materials in public institutions.

The Sourcebook is valuable because it can direct researchers to hard-to-find items in obscure journals or archival collections. The American Jewish Archives, the Central Archives for the History of the Jewish People in Jerusalem, and the YIVO and Leo Baeck institutes in New York are among the many collections included.

Published by Avotaynu Inc., the Sourcebook includes an appendix that lists surnames by the numeric-phonetic Daitch-Mokotoff soundex system so that, for instance, anyone researching an Elfassi line is also directed to materials pertaining to the Alves, Elbaz and Elves families.

The book is worth consulting next time you're in a major reference library.

Father's Divorce From Hell raises painful questions

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After years of court room combat with his ex-wife, Ben Gordon eventually won the battle. But Gordon's hard-won fight for joint custody of his two daughters proved to be a victory on paper only.

Ultimately, he lost the divorce war. The years of hostility, which began in 1990, took their toll on his relationship with his daughters, now 13 and 15. Gordon hasn't seem them for five years.

His experience, a cautionary tale about divorce lawyers and the justice system, is painstakingly documented in a new book, The Divorce From Hell, by Gordon's current mate, Toronto journalist Wendy Dennis.

Dennis spoke recently about Gordon's devastating custody battle and the need to enshrine fathers' custody rights in divorce legislation at the Jewish Book Fair, part of her national book tour.

Sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, her presentation sparked a heated debate among audience members, a group predominantly made up of single parents.

Dennis, who also went through a difficult divorce, said she felt "morally" compelled to tell Gordon's story after witnessing his painful divorce.

Describing him as a "loving Jewish dad who car-pooled and ran birthday parties," she said he was forced to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars "to retain the right to continue parenting his children after the divorce."

She said in the end, Gordon's ex-wife succeeded in "evicting him and his family from the children's lives. She was not held accountable and was encouraged by the judicial system every step of the way."

The parent who wants to protect the children and has their best interest at heart tends to be penalized by the judicial process which "promotes hostility and discord," Dennis said. A spouse can wage "the battle indefinitely as long as there's enough money and rage to fuel the battle.

"The girls were forced to collaborate in the mother's hatred of him," Dennis charged.

She noted that this type of hatred, known as parental alienation syndrome (PAS), is fostered by the domineering parent who has the psychological power to brainwash the vulnerable children in a divorce and turn them against the other parent.

When asked why she wrote the book, Dennis explained that Gordon wanted a record of the truth for his daughters.

The embryo of the book was a magazine article by the same title, written by Dennis in the February 1996 issue of Toronto Life. The article drew enormous reader response – both positive and negative – she said.

Among the responses were poignant letters from other men with stories similar to Gordon's. Concluding that his problem was part of widespread judicial bias against fathers, Dennis set out to write a book to promote the rights of fathers and children.

Children should have the right to both parents, she said. "Joint parenting should be the standard."

Dennis accused feminist groups who hate men of wanting to maintain the judicial status quo which gives mothers "dictatorial power." And they tend to use access to the children as a bargaining chip with the non custodial fathers, she added.

Commenting on the joint commons and senate parliamentary committee on child custody and access, which has recently received a lot of media attention, Dennis told The CJN there is a large groundswell of support in Canada for fathers' rights.

She said the findings of a recent Southam News poll indicate that 80 percent of Canadians believe the needs of the non-custodial parent and children are not being met by the courts.

As for the timing of her book, Dennis said she knew when she began writing The Divorce from Hell that the parliamentary committee would be tabling its report at the end of November and timed the book's launch to coincide with the release of the report.

However, she said she could not have foreseen the extent of media interest in the committee's work, which, in turn, has generated interest in her book. "That's pure serendipity."

Nursing home planned

TORONTO — A new 120-bed nursing home in York Region will be built by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care at a location to be announced soon.

It is scheduled to open in November 2000, and will be designed to care for the needs of frail Jewish seniors.

The announcement was made in Unionville by Cam Jackson, Ontario minister for long-term care, with responsibility for seniors.

At the same time, the minister said a total of 420 new long-term care beds will be built in York Region, including the Baycrest building.

The Baycrest York operation is in addition to a 120-bed unit for long-term care, operated by Baycrest, to open in June 2000, which was announced earlier this month.

Other initiatives include 98 interim long-term care beds at North York General Hospital's (NYGH) Branson division; a new 120-bed unit at Branson when it closes as a general hospital; 32 additional beds at the Seniors' Centre, NYGH; and a new 120-bed unit at a location to be announced by NYGH.

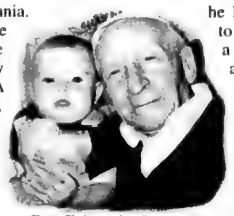
Ottawa man celebrates 100th birthday

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Over 300 family members, friends and well-wishers recently celebrated Benjamin Feinstein's 100th birthday.

Basking in the warmth of family, Feinstein reached a milestone he says he never dreamed possible during his youth in the small Russian village of Taplik.

He enjoys recounting stories of his boyhood adventures. At the age of 21, he and a group of friends attempted to escape from Russia to Romania. Captured by the Bolsheviks, he was temporarily imprisoned; A second attempt, however, was successful.



Ben Feinstein & great-grandson Eli Aaron

The goal of the group was to reach Palestine, but Feinstein became ill and was left behind when the group left. After four years in Romania, he had an opportunity to come to Canada as a refugee, and arrived in Winkler, Man. in 1924.

There, he met his future wife Frieda Dickstein, who died in 1986. Their family now includes four children, 12 grandchildren and 16 great-grandchildren.

In 1930, the family moved to Ottawa. He is a longtime member of B'nai Jacob Synagogue, where he served as vice-president for 14 years.

Until last year when Feinstein fell and fractured a hip, he was well known in his neighbourhood for taking long daily walks, and stopping to talk to his many friends. His daughter Ruth says that "he always knows what's going on in the world, and loves to discuss it."

Feinstein lives in his own apartment. His children and grandchildren are frequent visitors, but he likes to do things his own way, says his daughter Pearl. "I never make his porridge in the morning when I arrive because I couldn't do it just the way he likes it. He likes to do it himself. He also cooks his own chicken for Shabbat."

Feinstein begins every day by putting on his tfillin.

What advice does he have? "Take care of yourself and live a good, honest life."

When asked how it feels to be over 100, he replies with a twinkle in his eye, "I have no complaints."

Community Matters

Face to Face and Heart to Heart at GA '98

Over 100 Toronto delegates joined this year's General Assembly, sponsored by UJA Federations of North America. Dov Altman, a Director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was among them.

By Dov Altman

Many People, Many Roads, One Heart - The theme of the 1998 General Assembly in Israel. The perfect theme for both the first GA ever outside North America and the Toronto GA Mission.

Attending a GA is always an opportunity to discuss the social and cultural issues that affect us, as Jews, in North America. This year, for those of us from Toronto who visited Kiev on the way to Israel, the theme, the discussions and the debates became real.

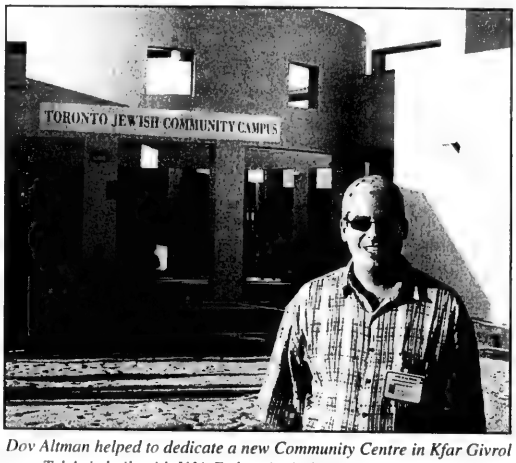
How did this happen? What made this year's GA more significant? It started with the visit to Ukraine and ended at a school in a small village in Israel. Many People, Many Roads, One Heart.

In Kiev, we saw first-hand how our UJA Federation dollars are working for those want to make aliyah.We met teenagers who were preparing to leave without their parents and parents beginning the long process of packing up their lives to move to a foreign land where they can live freely as Jews. Most importantly, we met those who are too old and sick to leave. These are the Jewish elderly who can survive with dignity because of UJA dollars.

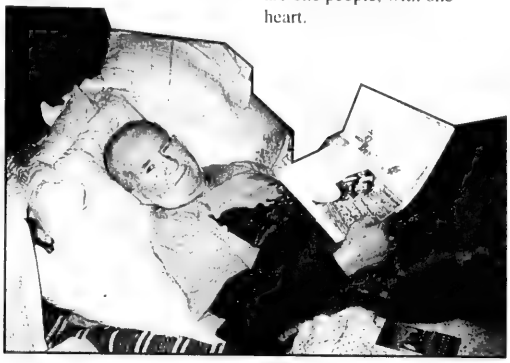
The Joint Distribution Committee has created a Chesed Seniors Centre in Kiev which provides for their basic needs as well as home visits, meals on wheels and medical services for those who cannot get out.

In Israel, the GA program allowed us to see how the country is dealing with the same social and cultural issues that we face in Toronto every day. Through a visit to a community centre in an economically depressed neighborhood, we saw programs that are keeping children off the street, strengthening the family unit and providing skills training, leading to jobs.We visited schools, daycare centres and libraries that could not have been built without UJA Federation's assistance. Many People, Many Roads, One Heart.

GA themes are usually forgotten from year to year, but not this year. Our UJA gifts are changing lives at home and abroad. After all, we may be many people from many backgrounds with many different beliefs and aspirations, however, our commitment to help fellow Jews, no matter when, no matter where, proves that we are one people, with one heart.



Dov Altman helped to dedicate a new Community Centre in Kfar Givrol near Tel Aviv built with UJA Federation's financial participation.



In Kiev, a Toronto delegation visited this 80 year old man whose paralysis has confined him to his tiny one bedroom apartment. The Chesed Program supplements his meagre $18 a month pension with additional food, clothing, and home care services.

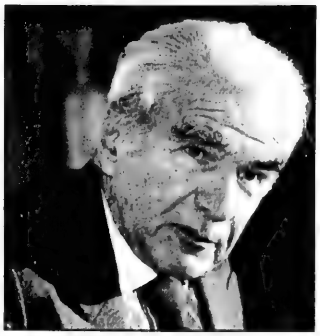
UJA Federation hosts respected reporter at doner dinner

Journalist Joins Mid-East Peace Monitoring Committee



Bernard Kalb

One of North America's most accomplished journalists will be playing an important role in the Mid-East peace process.

Bernard Kalb, speaking last week at a UJA Federation dinner for leading donors, revealed his appointment to a commission monitoring incitement by Palestinians and Israelis against each other. The anti-incitement provisions are part of the Wye Accords recently negotiated between the two sides, under which Israel has already turned over territory to the Palestinian Authority.

Although Kalb initially thought his participation on the committee could be an "exercise in futility," he later considered how much could be accomplished "if you can come up with a millimetre of an idea that will move the boulder a little bit."

As an example of how tough his task will be, Kalb cited a Palestinian TV show promoting jihad (holy war) for children, which, he said, "harnessed four or five year olds in a scenario of horror."

A Diplomatic Piece of Cake

Kalb called the Wye Agreement "child's play" compared to permanent status negotiations which are scheduled for completion by May 4, 1999. "We'll look back on Wye as a piece of cake," he noted. "We have to solve the future of Jerusalem, water rights and the return of refugees. No one in their right mind expects this to happen. Six months to do this is a scrap of time."

The moderator of Reliable Sources, a CNN show which turns a critical lens on the media, Kalb has travelled the globe for more than three decades as a correspondent covering world affairs for CBS, NBC and The New York Times. He's also experienced the other side of the podium as Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs and as spokesperson for the State Department for two years until October 1986.

Campaign Approaches Record Results

Dinner participants also learned that UJA Federation's current community Campaign for Fifty has hit the $33 million mark - about $5 million dollars ahead of last year at this time. "We did, in fact, aim higher, reach farther and tried to accomplish more than ever before," said campaign co-chair Larry Tanenbaum. "We set lofty goals and we think we are well on our way to achieving them."

The Campaign for Fifty's objective is to raise $50 million a year by 2001, with new funds designated for programs to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews in danger around the world.

Campaign co-chair Brent Belzberg expressed anxiety about budget cuts threatening essential services provided by UJA Federation's beneficiary agencies. "There can be no question about UJA Federation's responsibility to ensure their survival. As the community's central and primary organization, only we can step in to save services under a cloud of financial uncertainty, combining funding and values to preserve Jewish dignity. After all, how do you measure, in dollars and cents alone, the need to counsel a child who witnessed his mother being beaten, or advise nervous parents in Kiev to let their teenager make aliyah without them."

The dinner, chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman, was sponsored by the Royal Bank of Canada, a member of UJA Federation's corporate Partners program.

Bonnie Goldstein (l) and Jaclyn Shulman displayed their historic anthology, Voices From The Heart, a collection of stories and photos about the Canadian connection to Israel.

George Gaffney, Executive Vice President and General Manager, Royal Bank of Canada. "The Royal Bank," he said, "is proud to join UJA Federation in a commitment to a kinder, more caring world."

The World Chair of Keren Hayesod, Daniel Liwerant, brought greetings from Israel.

Onus for peace unfairly on Israel: former envoy

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The recent Wye treaty shows "the burden of proof for peace is always placed on Jewish shoulders," says an Israeli scholar and diplomat.

"Arafat and company...who have yet to keep one deal with anyone, let alone Israel, have not given up the nefarious dream of our disappearance," said Dr. Gerald M. Meister, director of the Israel Institute for Interreligious Studies, an interdisciplinary consortium of scholars.

"What Israel does diplomatically, is a very finely orchestrated and choreographed danse macabre in which we pay the piper," Meister told a large State of Israel Bonds – B'nai Brith Hamilton breakfast honoring Aaron Shiffman recently.

Meister, a veteran of numerous diplomatic assignments for Israel's Israeli foreign affairs ministry, warned there is no way Israel will achieve peace with its neighbor, "despite every kind of pullback or temporary agreement, [because] they are not going to be observed."

The fundamental rule of international law, he said, "is that treaties are meant to be observed."

Meister also highlighted other important issues facing Israel.

He noted that unemployment in development towns, which are usually not located near industry, has reached 17 percent. He also charged that Ashkenazi Jews are oblivious to the problems of Sephardi Jews: unemployment and lack of opportunity.

What Israel needs is "investment in Israel for the development of an infrastructure that has played second fiddle to defence needs.

"Investment is not charity. Investment requires good business horse sense. Invest, lend and give life to the Jewish state," Meister said.

Attendance at the annual Bonds-B'nai Brith breakfast at Adas Israel Synagogue was the largest ever and Bond sales were highly successful, said Hamilton Bonds office director Babara Balonjan.

Shiffman, executive director of Adas Israel Synagogue, administrator of the United Hebrew Memorial Chapel and a volunteer with numerous organizations, including the United Chevrah Kadishah, was praised by Adas Israel's Rabbi Morton Green as "an example and role model...[who] worked tirelessly and often thanklessly" on behalf of the community."

Hamilton artist Tobi Snajdman presented Shiffman with one of the artist's own paintings. The breakfast was chaired by former B'nai

Monty Hall receives Humanitarian Award by B'nai Brith

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — B'nai Brith Canada recently gave its 1998 Humanitarian Award to one of Winnipeg's favorite sons.

Monty Hall is best known for his long running television game show Let's Make A Deal.

Abe Simkin, a longtime friend, described him as a "philanthropist extraordinaire," who has helped raise close to $500 million for a variety of Israeli, Jewish, medical and children's causes.

One of Winnipeg's favorite sons

"Monty Hall deserves to join the good company of other distinguished individuals who have received this award," Simkin said.

The award is given in recognition of outstanding achievement in a chosen field of endeavor and leadership in community activities that result in the betterment of life for all people.

Previous winners have included Lloyd Axworthy, Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon and Israel Asper.

"Working for charitable causes was part of my upbringing," Hall said in accepting the award. "My zayde, David Rusen, brought over to Canada countless landsmen. My mother, Rose, [who was president of Hadassah Canada] was a teacher, singer, actress and leading fundraiser for Israel and Jewish causes. Whenever a relative was in need, mother would be on the phone telling other family members how much she expected them to contribute."

Hall also had praise for the community he grew up in. Winnipeg always looked after its own, he recalled.

"I am dismayed in Hollywood by the number of actors, directors, producers, writers who distance themselves from their roots. Not former Winnipeggers. Wherever we are, we are involved in charitable work. We have heart.

"In life, there are givers and takers. The takers eat well. The givers sleep well."

Hamilton day school seeking teacher/principal

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Kehila Jewish Community Day School, set to open in September 1999 with senior kindergarten, grades 1 and 2, is searching for a head teacher/principal.

Kehila will be the second day school in this community of 5,000. The Orthodox Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA) was founded in 1963.

As well, the city has three after-school schools: Beth Jacob Religious School, which is Conservative; Temple Anshe Sholom Religious School, Reform; and Midrasha, a community high school.

The need for an alternate Jewish day school became apparent several years ago, says Julia Kollek, a mother of two children, when a number of parents expressed an interest in finding a school with a broader approach to religious studies.

It began, says Kollek, who spearheaded the project, with a group of mothers talking about what they wanted in Jewish education, and the options available here.

Discussions began in earnest in 1996, after an independent survey by a McMaster University researcher indicated that of the 118 families who responded, 37 percent were interested in an alternate school.

"The school is not a reaction to the HHA," says Dr. Nick Kates, whose two children attended the academy.

"There are many good things about the academy, but it is our feeling that there are parents who are looking for an alternative."

The secular curriculum conforms to Ministry of Education guidelines and will integrate music, art, physical activity and social skills with language, math and technology.

Also, parents will be encouraged to play an active role in all aspects of the school.

Tuition fees are expected to be within the $5,000 range. Some donations have already been received, says Kollek, adding that the board has applied for a grant to the Boston-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education in North America, Jewish Day School Challenge Grant Program, which matches locally raised funds.

Winnipeg undertakes survey

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has undertaken an ambitious community-wide survey. The survey was mailed in early November to more than 5,000 Jewish households.

"We hope that the responses will really help us tune into what our community's needs are," says Evelyn Katz, a former WJCC president who is co-chairing the millennium committee needs and opportunities subcommittee that commissioned the Prairie Research Associates survey.

The 12-page booklet is divided into two sections and allows everyone in the household to fill in the survey. The Household Heads section asks questions about Jewish community involvement, the pros and cons of being Jewish in Winnipeg, questions about children and grandchildren, charitable giving and what changes they would like to see.

The children's section (for ages 12 and older) asks similar questions as well as where they expect to be in five or 10 years and what reasons would persuade them to stay in Winnipeg.

The deadline for returning the questionnaire was Nov. 27. Katz reported that the responses were coming in quite well. They will all be opened and reviewed after the deadline, she says, and the information will be collated by computer.

Founder of Saint John Jewish Museum retires

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Marcia Koven is going to find it hard to slow down, but the recently-retired founder and long-time major domo of the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum will manage – for a little while.

"There are lots of projects that need volunteers," she said last week during a rare idle hour.

Koven, 72, spent the last 15 years developing the museum into one that is respected in the Atlantic region and across Canada. Located in a building adjacent to Congregation Shaarei Zedek, the museum has attracted thousands of visitors from as far away as Australia and Israel.

"I never expected it would blossom into this when I started a private collection and oral interviews of the history of our community," she said.

Marcia Koven

"I had just graduated [at age 55] from University of New Brunswick at Saint John as a mature student and wondered what I wanted to do. With a major in sociology and a keen interest in history, I rented an office so I'd have somewhere to go.

"Within a year or so, I found space for a museum in the Saint John Jewish Community Centre next to the shul. We had two rooms in the basement, a $1,000 grant, some display cases from the New Brunswick government, and a government display person who gave us a very professional look. It just took off."

Now the entire three floors of the centre are used for the museum. The basement has displays, an office and the shul's mikvah. The first floor contains classrooms, a chapel and a summer art gallery. The top floor is a library for reading and research and an archive, one of only seven professional Jewish archives in Canada and the only one in the Atlantic Provinces.

Curator Catherine Biggs-Craft is the only full-time staff person. She joined the museum in 1986 and she admits that Koven "has been quite an influence on me. I had never met a Jewish person until I came here, but I've learned about the culture, way of life, and similarities to other religions and cultures. Marcia stressed education to everyone to eliminate discrimination."

Biggs-Craft said class groups are constantly touring the museum, with many teachers bringing their classes back year after year. The museum has prepared educational kits on Jewish holidays, the Holocaust and Jewish life cycle events that are in constant distribution to schools in New Brunswick.

"Catherine came to work for me from a class we were taking together at UNB-SJ," said Koven. "Otherwise, we hire summer students on government grants, and, ironically, only two or three over the years have been Jewish. Some, like Catherine, had never met a Jewish person, but within a week of training, can answer any question people throw at them."

Saint John's rich Jewish history traces from the mid-1750s through a period of high population in the 1920s to the 1960s when it started to dwindle.

Koven is thrilled everything at the museum is on microfilm at the provincial archives in Fredericton so nothing will ever be lost.

"We've shared our expertise with museums across the country. One display prepared by one of our students is in Moncton now, has been at the York-Sunbury Museum in Fredericton and will be shown in the Beth Tzedek museum in Toronto."

Koven was honored at a recent kiddush following Shabbat services.

Presentations were made by former Saint John mayor Elsie Wayne, now the deputy leader of the federal Progressive Conservative party, by the provincial government, and the Shaarei Zedek sisterhood and congregation.

"I was given a caricature by cartoonist Josh Beutel that was absolutely magnificent," she said.

Koven graduated as a registered nurse, but remained at home to bring up her four children. "I took hobby courses, art, sewing, public speaking, belly dancing, motor mechanics, yoga, and eventually thought 'enough of this. It's better to go to university.'

"The museum was my whole life – morning noon and night. I even kept paper and pencil by the bed because I would always awaken, thinking of ideas."

Principal sets goals

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Keeping kids connected, integrating them into the community, and bridging the gap between young and old, are some of the aims of Laura Wolfson, Temple Anshe Sholom Religious School's new principal.

"The direction I want to go in, is to increase family participation, and introduce a parallel education program for parents. I have all kinds of ideas," she said.

The first program to be introduced in the 140-student school, is Solelim, a once-a-month, 90-minute class plus social program for post-confirmation students in grades 11 to 13, designed to keep them within the community.

She has also revived the temple youth groups, and introduced a reading program which has seniors reading stories to children. That, she explained, is a good way of introducing children to older adults outside of their own families.

Wolfson also plans to expand the children's library, and intends to include a video collection.

Wolfson, born in Toronto, is the daughter of Herb and Joy Wolfson. The family belonged to Holy Blossom Temple.

Book reflects Canadian experience

MONTREAL — Sociologist Morton Weinfeld, who holds the Chair in Canadian Ethnic Studies at McGill University, and historian Desmond Morton, director of the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada, have collaborated on a book entitled Who Speaks for Canada? Words That Shape a Country (McClelland and Stewart, 332 pp), a collection of memorable words by mostly noteworthy Canadians.

As co-editors, Weinfeld and Morton combed through almost limitless sources of possible entries to select 130 brief texts, including essays, speeches, letters, short stories, poems and the like that together, in Weinfeld's words, offer a vision of Canada without a surfeit of breast-beating patriotism or sentimental paeans to the land's natural beauty.

Weinfeld said they were influenced by a book published in the United States by Dian Ravitch, called The American Reader, but were looking to produce something "more substantive."

Together, they believe they bring different strengths and perspectives to this project. Morton has expertise in the full spectrum of Canadian history, with special interests in military and labor history, while Weinfeld concentrates on ethnic communities and immigration.

They spent more than three years going over potential material, making their selections on the basis of both the text's merits and on who the author was. "We didn't simply want great English and French political leaders. We wanted women, immigrants, members of First Nations as well," Weinfeld said.

About a quarter of the entries are by francophones, including some sovereigntists, whose work may not be familiar to English Canadians.

Jewish representation includes poets Irving Layton and Leonard Cohen, NDP leader David Lewis, and an excerpt from None is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper. There is also a reprint of the act the Quebec assembly passed in 1832 that permitted Ezekiel Hart to take his seat.

The theme is not what makes Canada great or what the country means to each author, Weinfeld said. Rather, the co-editors are seeking to present a book that when taken as a whole will reflect the variety and specialness of the Canadian experience. Weinfeld believes Canada is, indeed, a model of tolerance and harmony for the world, "despite its internal squabbles."

Besides inter-group relations, Canada has also excelled at finding a balance between such issues as free speech and protection against hate, the roles of the public and private sectors, and the divide between the judiciary and government.

He characterizes the contributors as "Canada's founders, leaders, crusaders, reformers, artists, and so-called ordinary people, who together have tried to make Canada a better place and to define the essence of this unique country." The written word is enhanced by photos and works of art.

In the introduction, Weinfeld writes about what it was like to grow up in Canada – or, more precisely, Quebec – in the 1960s as the son of Polish immigrants, Holocaust survivors.

"From my family and their experiences I learned the dangers of intolerance and the importance of fair treatment for all minorities. I also learned to value the enrichment that can come from ethnocultural and spiritual heritage. And I came to appreciate, and love, Canada, in all its diversity," despite misgivings about historical anti-Semitism, racism and discrimination.

He says he always had a "visceral admiration" for French Quebecers' struggle to maintain their identity in North America because of a "similar" Jewish experience.

Much of his appreciation of Canada stems from how his parents viewed the country. His father had been a lawyer in Poland, but here had to work as a low-paid bookkeeper. Yet, his parents loved the country because of its freedom, plenty and opportunity, at least, for their son.

"The strength of Canada is apparent to the world community. It should be apparent to Canadians, whatever their background, language, region, class, or gender...

"There is no reason for excessive triumphalism, for we still have work to do. But, as we move into the next century, let us pause for a moment of quiet satisfaction."

Ottawa marks Israel's 50th with variety of events

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Events grand and small marked the recent Israel at 50 celebration at the National Arts Centre.

The wide variety of exhibits and events showcased the many facets of life in Israel.

An art and photography exhibit, representing Israeli art over five decades, and an exhibit of science and technology were both on display throughout the week at no charge. The L'Chaim Stage in the foyer featured frequent performances of Israeli song and dance.

Zuckerman in concert

Local students were invited to a free screening of the film Exodus, and an open rehearsal of the National Arts Centre Orchestra conducted by Pinchas Zukerman.

Thanks to corporate sponsorship, the community was also able to attend a free screening of Exodus, introduced by Col. Yoash Tsiddon-Chatto, commander of one of the immigrant ships that inspired the novel on which the film is based.

In spite of months of careful planning, there were some last minute glitches. A scheduled lecture by former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres was cancelled when he called off his trip to Canada on the eve of Israel's signing of the Wye accord.

As well, a concert conducted by Pinchas Zukerman and featuring the young Israeli violinist Ariel Shamai was nearly cancelled when the National Arts Centre Orchestra threatened to go on strike. The concert was saved at the eleventh hour when the musicians announced that the strike would begin immediately after the concert.

The strike cancelled a second concert the next night.

The Israel at 50 celebrations were presented under the honorary co-chairmanship of David Sultan, Israeli ambassador to Canada, and Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, and under the honorary patronage of senators Leo Kolber and Jerry S. Grafstein and David Berger, Canada's ambassador to Israel.

The organizing committee was chaired by Sara Vered and Norman Barwin, president of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation.

Montreal Hillel's PBJam helps feed the hungry

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Last week, for the third straight year, the Hillel Jewish Student Centre found itself in a very sticky situation.

It wasn't that it was just before finals or that Chanukah was less than three weeks away.

But, at seven Hillel CEGEP and university sites across Montreal, for two days, tables were being set up near campus libraries and students were being asked to take a minute from studying for exams to make a simple peanut butter and jelly sandwich for the hungry in Montreal.

The program was called PBJam, and organizer Pam Silbiger said in an interview that the main idea has been to instil in students the notion that even before exam time, when they are cramming like crazy, they can still spare a minute, literally, to do a good deed.

The idea came to 20-year-old Silbiger, a third-year McGill University social work student, friend Marion Miller and other Hillel students three years ago.

The first year the PBJam was run only at McGill. Last year it went on to include Dawson and Marianopolis CEGEPS, and this year the the PBJam, which is run as part of Hillel's Ani Ve'Ata social action group agenda, has spread, so to speak, to Vanier College, Concordia University, John Abbott College and the Centre Hillel.

Silbiger related, this year's PBJam required Hillel volunteers to go out and solicit for free or to purchase at a discount 20 cases each of peanut butter and assorted jams and jellies in giant-sized jars, and 575 loaves of bread – enough to put together close to 8,000 sandwiches. All kosher. And that doesn't include the sandwich bags, plastic knives and table cloths, and, for sanitary reasons, rubber gloves.

Some of the local businesses approached this year to donate food and paper products included Costco, IGA, Montreal Harvest, Loblaws and bakeries.

Silbiger said that many of the students approached to make sandwiches – about 7,000 in all – chuckled a bit at the PBJam idea, but also thought it innovative and appreciated the point organizers were trying to make.

Certainly, Silbiger knows something about community service. She performed her first volunteer work at age five, lighting Chanukah candles for B'nai Brith at the Jewish General Hospital. She hasn't stopped since then, doing everything from singing for seniors at Maimonides Hospital Geriatric Centre to taking part in B'nei Akiva and NCSY programs. She is also on the McGill Hillel board.

"I love helping people. It's something that's been instilled in me for as long as I can remember."

The sandwiches, she said, will be distributed to Le Mercaz, the Old Brewery Mission, Dans la Rue, the NDG Food Bank, the Welcome Home Mission, Multi-Caf, and other food banks.

SFU offering Judaism 101

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation recently announced the formation of a Judaism 101 class slated to begin in January 1999.

Belinda Hassall, a Vancouver Hillel member from Simon Fraser University, will be spearheading the program. "I want students to have the opportunity to explore and discuss Judaism comfortably regardless of their level of knowledge," she says. "With students teaching students, this Judaism 101 class has the potential to achieve this."

Inspired by a recent visit from Edgar M. Bronfman to Vancouver Hillel, Hassall wanted to find a way of incorporating a beit midrash style of learning, an approach to Judaism that would be both creative and fun.

During his visit to Vancouver, Bronfman spoke of making "the synagogue more of a beit midrash. ... I don't want rabbis to be slaves to the siddur," he said "and I don't want congregations to be slaves to the rabbi."

Bronfman's goal to revitalize Jewish learning is already happening on college and university campuses throughout the world. As chairman of the International Board of Governors of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, he has initiated his vision for a Jewish Renaissance.

Osteoporosis a health concern for all ages

Louise Lipman's story is not typical. A mother of two, wife, and successful business owner, she is facing a challenge few women do at her age. Lipman, 45, has osteoporosis, a disease that affects between 1.4 and 1.8 million Canadians.

Osteoporosis is often called the silent thief, because it robs the body of bone mass with few warning signs. It develops over a long period of time, weakening bones and making them easier to break. At times, the disease is painful and debilitating.

Lipman was diagnosed with osteoporosis last year. But for more than eleven years, she had experienced intermittent pain in her hips and knees. Finally, she requested a bone density test.

"I always knew the pain was not normal and that it might have something to do with my bones, but it never crossed my mind that it was osteoporosis," Lipman says. "It was a disease that I always associated with the little old lady down the street, not with someone my age."

Lipman is an exception. Most people are diagnosed with osteoporosis when they experience a broken bone. By then, the disease is usually fairly well advanced. "Osteoporosis has few warning signs, making it hard to diagnosis, and, therefore, it usually goes undetected and untreated until there is a fracture," explains Mount Sinai Hospital rheumatologist Dr. Jerry Tenenbaum.

"Unless you have had a fracture, it's rare for osteoporosis to be a cause of spontaneous bone pain. It's usually a 'silent thief' at such a young age."

Osteoporosis affects about one in four women over the age of 50, due to accelerated bone loss after menopause. But it's not just a female disease. It also affects about one in eight men over the age of 50 years.

To Your Health

In Lipman's case, she was not over 50, there was no family history of osteoporosis and she grew up drinking milk because her father was a dentist. She attributes her osteoporosis to her lifestyle. She did not exercise much in comparison to her sister, smoked for a time and drank coffee to excess.

Bone loss is inevitable with age. However there are ways to slow down the process.

"Osteoporosis is not a health concern for just the elderly, it's a concern for all ages," Dr. Tenenbaum says. "It is important that people begin building strong healthy bones right from birth so that they have the best defense when the aging process begins."

Building strong bones before the age of 30 is the best weapon. For some, it is a question of combining nutrition with exercise. However, for others who have a higher risk of developing osteoporosis, medications may be required.

When Lipman was diagnosed with osteoporosis, she had lost 35 percent of the bone mass in her hip. Today, she's building that bone back up by changing her lifestyle. Rather than taking her diagnosis lying down, Lipman is taking it in stride. She walks a minimum of one mile every day and runs three miles, three times a week on her treadmill.

She's begun a weight-lifting program and laughs about becoming a body builder. She has also made changes to her diet to include more calcium-rich foods, calcium supplements and a bisphosphonate to treat her disease.

"Bisphosphonates are a fairly new family of non-hormonal agents used in the treatment of osteoporosis," explains Dr. Tenenbaum. "Bisphosphonates act on the bone and increase the bone mass, helping to reduce the risk of vertebral fractures."

The two main bisphosphonates used in the treatment of osteoporosis are etidronate (Didronel or Didrocal) and alendronate (Fosomax). While also used in treating men with osteoporosis, both of these treatments are important alternatives to post-menopausal women who are unable or unwilling to use hormone replacement therapy.

The side effects of bisphosphonates are gastrointestinal problems such as diarrhea or heartburn. Other side effects include nausea, skin rashes, and in rare instances, esophageal problems.

Lipman's life is forever altered by her osteoporosis. "I have become very cautious about everything that I do. Even hiking, I'm afraid of falling or breaking a bone. Before, if I broke a bone, it would repair itself. Now, I wonder if it will ever repair itself. I have even had to change my dress style – now, I wear only flat shoes. No more high heels.

"But I think the most profound way this disease has affected my life is that I can no longer pick up my children."

This story was reprinted from the Mount Sinai publication Health Report, fall 1998 edition.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My family loves mashed potatoes, but I find that the only way to make them taste creamy and delicious is by adding a lot of butter or cream. Do you have any lower fat suggestions?

A. I also love regular mashed potatoes and have found a few low-fat ways to make them. Using buttermilk is a good choice, since it's low in fat and very creamy and flavorful. Another great alternative is to add roasted garlic. Roasted garlic gives a lot of flavor and a creamy texture.

Q. Is a veggie burger always the better choice at a hamburger restaurant?

A. It depends on how you define better. Veggie burgers are not always the lowest calorie or lowest total fat choice, particularly if a grilled chicken breast on a bun is an option. While many veggie burgers are low in total fat, saturated fats and calories, many have a lot of fat in the form of egg, oil or seeds and nuts, added to give flavor and texture. Depending on your reasons for choosing the veggie burger, ask the necessary questions so you can make an educated decision.

Chanukah Delights

Luscious latkes can be a dessert

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Potato latkes are Chanukah's signature dish, not because of the potato, but because of the oil. Potatoes did not exist in the Holy Land when the Jewish people triumphed over the Syrians.

While there is evidence that the custom of making latkes from potatoes originated in Russia, innovative Jewish cooks have extended the repertoire for centuries. Adding sugar to late-harvest produce, they created sensational desserts.

Like carrot cakes, carrot latkes have hit the dessert circuit, too. Infused with vanilla and almonds, they are dusted with confectioners' sugar. Don't worry if they cool; they're irresistible at room temperature too.

Inspired by seasonal fruit, cranberry latkes are an American contribution to Chanukah cuisine. With orange juice and raisins playing counterpoint to tart berries, they burst with piquant flavor.

VIENNESE LAYER LATKES

2 16-ounce jars applesauce
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. ground cloves
¼ cup brown sugar
6 eggs
2 cups small-curd cottage cheese
¼ cup sweet butter, melted; plus 4 pats
6 tbsp. flour
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. sugar
½ tsp. vanilla
Stick-free cooking spray
1 cup walnuts, finely ground
confectioners' sugar

Combine applesauce, spices and brown sugar in saucepan. Boil over medium heat, stirring often. Let cool.

In large bowl, place eggs, beating until foamy. Add cheese, ¼ cup butter, flour, salt, sugar and vanilla, beating well. Divide batter into 8 bowls.

Coat an 8-inch, non-stick frying pan and an 8-inch springform pan with cooking spray.

Place frying pan on medium flame, melting half pat of butter.

Pour batter from first bowl into frying pan, spreading evenly.

Brown lightly. Turn crepe, browning on other side.

Move crepe to springform pan. Coat with applesauce and sprinkle with walnuts. Pour batter from rest of the bowls, one at a time, to brown crepes individually. Coat each with applesauce and walnuts and layer in springform pan.

Bake 10 minutes at 350 degrees, until heated through. Take pan from oven, place on plate, and remove sides. Sprinkle with confectioners' sugar. Cut into 10 wedges.

No fudge — unmasking a candy conspiracy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of my 11-year-old's chief memories of our family vacation to the Black Hills is that he couldn't have fudge.

Why fudge? Well, every single park, tourist trap, rest stop or gas station that we visited seemed to have at least 200 to 300 tiny little fudge shops purposely sending their aroma in our direction. It is guaranteed that whatever looks and smells good on vacation usually isn't kosher.

Anyone who keeps kosher knows that travelling to remote spots (there would appear to be fewer than 20 Jews and no kosher meat in South Dakota) can be an exercise in creativity.

You can get fruit and tuna and peanut butter anywhere – and after a 10-day diet of that stuff, you'd happily eat dirt just for something different (like fudge) – but, trust me, there is no kosher fudge shop in the Black Hills. We looked.

We made do with M&Ms and Oreos for our chocolate fixes, but it wasn't quite the same.

Sure we survived, but I promised my kids that one of the first things I'd make when we got home would be – you guessed it – fudge.

Here are several of the recipes that we made (and ate) during our first three days back.

CHOCOLATE FUDGE BALLS

2¼ oz. water
4½ oz. sugar
4½ oz. ground walnuts
4½ oz. ground almonds
4½ oz. ground coconut
4½ oz. unsweetened chocolate
4½ oz. honey
2 or 3 tbsps. kirsch
Cocoa powder to roll balls in

In a saucepan, over a low heat, dissolve the sugar in the water. Add the chocolate and heat to melt. Add all other ingredients except kirsch and cocoa.

Stir continuously over low heat until the mixture becomes a paste. Remove from heat, add the kirsch and mix well. Let the mixture cool completely. Form into small balls (size of a walnut) and roll the ball in the cocoa. Serve in small paper candy cups. Makes 25 to 30.

MICROWAVE FUDGE

3 cups semi-sweet chocolate chips
1 cup sweetened condensed milk
1 tsp. vanilla extract
½ cup chopped walnuts
Dash Salt

Place the chocolate chips in a large microwaveable bowl. Microwave on high for 5 minutes or until chips are glossy. Remove from microwave and stir until smooth. Stir in the milk, salt, vanilla and walnuts.

Place waxed paper on the bottom of an 8-inch pan. Spread mixture in the pan and chill for 2 hours or until firm. Cut into squares. Makes 16 pieces. Options: Rocky Road – omit walnuts and add 1 cup chopped pecans or walnuts and 2 cups kosher miniature marshmallows.

FAST CHOCOLATE-PECAN FUDGE

½ cup butter or margarine
¼ cup cocoa
4 cups confectioner's sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
½ cup evaporated milk
1 cup pecan pieces

Line 9X13-inch pan with foil; set aside. In medium microwaveable bowl, microwave butter on high (full power) 1 to 1½ minutes or until melted. Add cocoa; stir until smooth. Stir in confectioner's sugar and vanilla; blend well (mixture will be dry and crumbly). Stir in evaporated milk.

Microwave on high 1 minute; stir. Microwave an additional minute or until mixture is hot. Beat with wooden spoon until smooth; add pecan pieces. Pour into prepared pan. Cover; chill until firm. Cut into small squares. Store covered in refrigerator. Makes about 3 dozen squares.

CREAM CHEESE FUDGE

8 oz. cream cheese, softened
4 cups sifted powdered sugar
4 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened, melted)
dash salt
½ cup chopped nuts
1 tbsp. vanilla

Using a mixer beat the cream cheese until it's soft. Gradually add the powdered sugar mixing well. Add the chocolate, salt, nuts and vanilla. Mix well. Pour the mixture into a buttered 8-inch pan. Chill several hours and cut into small squares.

DARK CHOCOLATE MINT FUDGE

6 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate (not unsweetened), chopped
¼ cup marshmallow creme
1½ oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
½ tsp. peppermint extract
1½ cups sugar
¾ cup sweetened condensed milk
⅓ cup water
⅓ cup whipping cream
¼ cup (½ stick) unsalted butter, cut into pieces

Line 9x5-inch loaf pan with foil, overlapping sides. Place first 4 ingredients in metal bowl and set aside. Mix sugar, milk, water, cream and butter in heavy 3-quart saucepan. Stir over medium-low heat until the sugar dissolves. Brush down sugar crystals from sides of pan using pastry brush dipped into water. Increase heat to high; bring to rolling boil. Reduce heat to medium-high; stir slowly with wooden spoon until clip-on candy thermometer registers 232 F. (about 9 minutes).

Pour the boiling mixture over ingredients in bowl; do not scrape the pan. Stir the mixture in the bowl vigorously with wooden spoon until chocolate melts and fudge thickens slightly, about 2 minutes (mixture should still be very soft and glossy). Immediately pour fudge into prepared pan; smooth top with rubber spatula. Refrigerate fudge until firm enough to cut, about 2 hours.

Lift fudge from pan, using foil

Israel to stop demolishing houses built without permits

By AMIRA HASS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Prime Minister's Office (PMO) has promised that Israel will not demolish some 700 homes built on the West Bank without civil administration permits.

The homes, constructed over the last three years, are all located within the zoning boundaries of various villages.

Recently, however, hundreds of police officers presided over the demolition of an East Jerusalem house built without a permit.

The house in Beit Hanina belonged to Sherif Ahmad Abdallah, a Palestinian who returned to Israel last year after a prolonged stay in the United States. Abdallah said that he knew he needed a permit, but that his lawyer had told him he was taking care of matters with the municipality.

Michael Stoltz, deputy director of the PMO's policy planning division, made the commitment on the West Bank houses in an October letter he e-mailed to correspondents abroad who had protested the prospect of the houses being bulldozed.

A senior source in the office of the coordinator of government activities in the territories told Ha'aretz that Israel has stopped razing homes built without permits.

Stoltz's letter said that approximately 700 homes built within village boundaries would not be razed – but that several hundred others built outside those boundaries were slated for demolition, as they occupy state-owned land or lie in areas where their presence constitutes a security risk.

Stoltz wrote, "While special efforts are made to be lenient with those who built without the proper permits, sometimes – particularly when the violation has security implications – demolition is unavoidable."

A source in the office of the coordinator said he believed a significant portion of the 700 homes are located in areas slated to be ceded to the Palestinian Authority (PA) in the context of the implementation of the Wye agreement. The source said several of the homes were located in territory transferred to civilian PA control 10 days ago.

Israel is not interested in generating the added tension that would come from demolishing homes, the source said – but will resume a more rigid enforcement of building laws once Wye is implemented.

Axworthy at meeting on Mideast

WASHINGTON — Canada's foreign minister, Lloyd Axworthy, was in Washington this week to participate in the Conference to Support the Middle East Peace Process and Development.

The foreign ministers of 50 countries were invited to take part.

While in Washington, Axworthy held talks with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

"With the signing of the Wye River Memorandum, Israel and the Palestinians have taken another step toward achieving a just and lasting peace," Axworthy said in a statement. "This conference demonstrates the commitment of the international community to supporting the peace process and Palestinian development."

Wiesenthal Centre to expand programs on tolerance

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — In a major expansion, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre has purchased a three-storey building to house its extensive tolerance education programs for law enforcement officers, teachers, students and corporations.

The $6.6-million facility lies directly across the street from the centre's Museum of Tolerance.

Participants in the Tools for Tolerance and Steps to Tolerance program are exposed to the hands-on multimedia learning centre, exhibits on the Holocaust and worldwide genocides, and workshops on racism and bigotry.

A total of 20,000 police officers and sheriff's deputies, and 7,000 educators, have graduated from the programs so far. During the last school year, 6,000 students from 117 public and private schools also participated.

At a brief ceremony, the California Arts Council, a state agency, recently presented a cheque for $2.5 million to Rabbi Meyer May, the centre's executive director, as the state's contribution toward the building purchase.

As the most diverse state in the country, where public school students hail from 140 nations and speak 105 languages, California is the leader in lifelong tolerance education, said the council's director, Barbara Pieper.

The Wiesenthal Centre will match this amount, and the remaining cost will be covered through rents from the building's street-level tenants.

"There is no better place to teach these programs than through the Museum of Tolerance, and what we do here has a national and global impact," she added.

Previous to the current grant, the centre had received $11 million in state support.

Part of the new building may also be used for the centre's proposed children's museum, said Rabbi Marvin Hier, the centre's dean and founder.

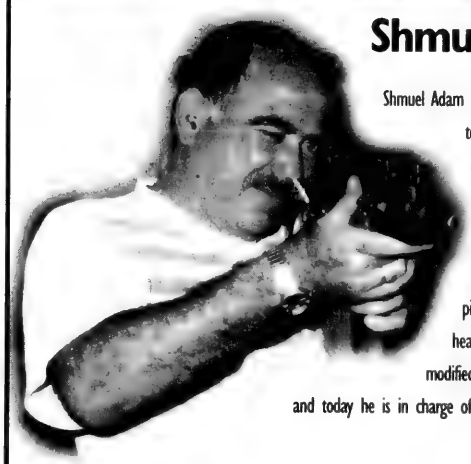
Shmuel Adam. Aiming For Success



Shmuel Adam was a leader in the Anti Terrorist Unit of the IDF. On March 11, 1978 he was summoned to fight 11 terrorists who had taken hostage of a bus carrying families on a day trip from Haifa to Jerusalem. The unit moved in, killing most of the terrorists, but in the fight, his arm was severed from his shoulder, his other hand totally crushed. After surgery, he began his rehabilitation at Beit Halochem.

Says Shmuel, "Whatever I can do with my hand is thanks to the wonderful physiotherapists at Beit Halochem. But they showed me more ... the best rehabilitation was in my head, not in my hand". To overcome his disability, he began inventing and building specially modified weapons. His injuries did not stop him ... he continued to work for the IDF until 1988, and today he is in charge of security at Israeli Hydro.

Argentine commission criticized

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A commission investigating Argentina's role as a refuge for Nazi war criminals has issued a preliminary report and "the results are mixed," according to a Canadian observer helping monitor the commission's work.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC), said the report "makes no sense" in finding that only about 150 Nazis escaped to Argentina.

"Given that Canada's special unit on war crimes has investigated more than 1,000 files it seems highly unlikely that Argentina, a country with close social and political ties to Nazi Germany, would have only 150," Littman said.

Littman is the only Canadian representative on an international panel established to scrutinize the work of the Commission for the Clarification of Nazi Activities in Argentina (CEANA). The advisory group includes representatives of the American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, B'nai Brith, DAIA (the Argentine Jewish federation) and the Latin American Jewish Congress. CEANA's personnel includes a number of social scientists and academics headed by Argentine historian Ignacio Klitch, who is Jewish.

The commission was appointed by Argentine Foreign Minister Diego Di Tella after the extradition of war criminals Josef Schwammberger and Erich Priebke brought attention to Argentina's role as a refuge for Nazis. Other notorious war criminals who made Argentina their postwar home included Adolf Eichmann and Josef Mengele.

Members of the commission have investigated various national archives, but their findings are incomplete, Littman asserted. "The German, Spanish and French members of the academic committee were eager but inexperienced...I had the feeling we were dealing with a bunch of raw, graduate students.

"They were virtually looking in the wrong places at times, in the wrong archives. They were also short of manpower and financial support.

"For example, the Spanish researcher assigned to unravel the Nazi escape route through Spain felt she needed to travel to Barcelona to view an important archive, but there was no money to buy a train ticket," Littman said.

Littman, who travelled to Buenos Aires for the release of CEANA's preliminary findings, also criticized the original one-year time limit placed on the commission's work.

"That was extremely unrealistic," he said. "Anyone who has done archival historical research knows progress is usually extremely slow. Fortunately, CEANA has extended its mandate for another year. But even that may not be enough time to bring out the truth."

Littman also suggested researchers are devoting too much of their efforts investigating German and Austrian war criminals when "only about 25 percent of war criminals are Germans or Austrians. Most were collaborators in the police and slaughter groups. In Canada, more than 75 percent are East European or Central European collaborators."

"Can a Peronista regime, led by a Peronista president and a Peronista foreign minister be trusted to unearth the truth regardless of how painful it may prove to be?" he asked.

SWC vice-president Shimon Samuels, who is also a member of the advisory group, was skeptical about CEANA's report as well. "If this is going to be the official version then it's unacceptable," he told the Guardian newspaper. Littman and Samuels were also critical of the commission's lack of progress in determining whether looted Nazi assets were deposited in Argentina.

Despite his doubts, Littman said he believed Argentine President Carlos Menem has been sincere in reaching out to the Jewish community. He pointed out that a statue of former Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg was recently unveiled in Buenos Aires. In January 1944, Sweden took over representation of Argentine diplomatic interests in Budapest, making Wallenberg a representative of Argentine interests at the time he was saving thousands of Hungarian Jews.

Members of CEANA and the advisory committee also visited the bombed site of the Jewish community building in downtown Buenos Aires. The blast killed 115 people four years ago. No arrests have been made in the case.

Insurance, artwork to be discussed

• and David Walden of the Heritage department's Moveable Cultural Property Program. Walden is the team's expert on artworks.

The conference, hosted by the U.S. State Department and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, will also attempt to tie up issues left over on Nazi gold.

At last year's London conference on looted gold, Ottawa presented the report by Carleton University history professor Duncan McDowall, which found no evidence that Nazi gold made its way into Canada. Other nations viewed the report as a model of research.

Much has happened since the London conference. Private Swiss banks reached a $1.25 billion (US) out-of-court settlement with Holocaust survivors over the issue of seized bank accounts. Swiss banks also set up a $185 million humanitarian fund for needy survivors, of which roughly $2.5 million was allotted to Canada.

Just last week, Switzerland's two largest banks said they would make an initial payment of $250 million this week as part of the settlement.

The money, the first of three installments, will go into an escrow account and will not be available to survivors until a final settlement agreement and distribution plan are finalized sometime next year.

Swiss banks say they have paid about $4 million to some 84 Holocaust survivors so far from accounts left over from the Holocaust era.

But experts agree that the issue of insurance policies and artworks will be more difficult than bank accounts or gold.

CJC recently met with officials from the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association to examine possible dormant Holocaust insurance policies in this country.

The association agreed to set up toll-free numbers, in English and French, to assist anyone seeking information on possible unclaimed insurance proceeds owing to victims and survivors of the Holocaust and their heirs.

The numbers are 1-800-860-3413 in English and 1-888-361-8070 in French. Toronto callers can dial 359-2008.

Israel considering Lebanon withdrawal

The proposal was based on UN Security Council Resolution 425, which calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon alongside security guarantees that attacks would not be launched on Israel from Lebanon.

Netanyahu said Sunday that the Israeli army will remain in Lebanon until the safety of Israel's northern communities can be assured. But at the same time, he said that every effort would be made to minimize troop casualties.

Meanwhile, President Ezer Weizman called on Syrian President Hafez Assad to resume negotiations with Israel. Prime Minister Shimon Peres suspended the talks in March 1996 after Syria failed to condemn a series of suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Speaking after a condolence visit to the family of one of four soldiers killed last week, Weizman said only a political solution involving Syria would bring an end to the fighting in southern Lebanon.

As politicians suggested ways out of the morass in Lebanon, the Israel Defence Force sought ways to lower the number of combat deaths sustained there.

All of the seven Israeli soldiers killed during the past two weeks were victims of roadside bombs planted by Hezbollah near Israeli outposts in the security zone.

Senior army and defence officials were reported to be considering ways to reduce the number of IDF positions in the nine-mile-wide zone.

Struggle against terrorism key to Wye Accord's success

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The peace-for-security Wye memorandum, struck on Oct. 23 to round off the jagged edges of the 1994 and 1995 Olso accords, could be a turning point in the struggle against terrorism.

Mideast Analysis

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would not have signed the American-sponsored agreement without Yasser Arafat's verifiable pledge to systematically fight terrorism and without the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency's direct involvement in the process. On the basis of these understandings, and compelling evidence of the Palestinian Authority's resolve to crack down on Islamic groups that oppose peace, the Israeli government last month authorized the first of three withdrawals from the West Bank. The next redeployment is due to take place in mid-December, and the third one in January 1999.

If the Palestinians hew to a policy of "zero tolerance" for terrorism, and if Israel refrains from undertaking provocative unilateral actions on the ground, there is a chance, however slim, that the two sides may actually wind up final status talks on schedule next May.

The spectre of terrorism, perpetrated in the main by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which oppose Israel's existence, has haunted the Oslo process from the very outset.

Within weeks of the signing of the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, Israel was hit by a sickening series of random attacks – knifings and shootings – which claimed the lives of civilians and soldiers.

But the heaviest burden Israelis had to bear was the spate of suicide bombings that erupted in the spring of 1994, following Dr. Baruch Goldstein's single-handed massacre of 29 Palestinian worshippers in a Hebron mosque. The Shin Bet's subsequent assassination of Hamas bomb maker Yaya Ayyash led to further bombings.

Terrorism has exacted a terrible toll, killing 73 persons in 1994, 52 in 1995, 77 in 1996 and 29 in 1997. With each major attack, the Palestinian Authority was pushed by Israel and the United States into imposing controls on the Islamic militants. But Arafat, fearing a civil war and susceptible to the accusation of being an Israeli agent, never really tried to crush the radicals and their infrastructure. Indeed, in releasing detainees shortly after they had been arrested in much-publicized sweeps, he left the disconcerting impression that he was merely going through the motions and practising a cynical "revolving door" policy.

As a result, Arafat came under sharp criticism. "The Palestinian Authority is taking certain localized actions," said Netanyahu last April, referring to arrests of terrorists and busts of bomb factories. "But it is not doing everything it needs to do against terrorism." Netanyahu's advisor, David Bar-Ilan, put it more pithily: "Our complaint is not that terror exists, but rather that the Palestinian Authority does not do enough to fight it."

With the Wye accord, which is widely regarded as another step toward Palestinian statehood, the Palestinian Authority may finally be ready to deal with terrorism seriously.

Since Oct. 23, the Palestinian Authority has arrested hundreds of Islamic activists, and in an unprecedented measure, placed Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheik Ahmad Yassin, under house arrest and severed his phone lines. Bitterly complaining about the Palestinian Authority's cooperation with Israel and the Central Intelligence Agency, and cognizant of Arafat's promise of a "100 percent effort" to combat terrorism, Yassin admitted that Hamas' military wing was encountering "many difficulties" in mounting operations.

Ever since the Palestinian Authority resumed security cooperation with Israel in October 1997, following the withdrawal of such services in the wake of Israel's decision to build the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, the incidence of terrorism has declined significantly. So far this year, eight Israelis have fallen victim to terrorism, and there have been no successful suicide bombings. But Israeli counter measures have also drastically reduced Hamas' ability to wreak havoc.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 23

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu invited his old political rival, David Levy, to return to the government as finance minister. Levy resigned as foreign minister in January, citing differences over the peace process and domestic issues.

• Netanyahu attempted to reassure Jewish settlers that Israel stands firmly behind them despite the latest redeployment. "I believe in the future of this place and am ready to make every investment – material, security, even morale," he said during a tour of West Bank settlements. "Those considering leaving should think twice."

Nov. 24

• Israel transferred additional civilian responsibilities to the Palestinian Authority in an area near the West Bank town of Ramallah. The move comes as part of the further redeployment called for in the Wye accord. Palestinians will assume full control in some additional West Bank areas, and shared control with Israel in others.

• Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman asked the United States for more than $1 billion in aid to help pay for Israel's latest redeployment in the West Bank. Ne'eman met with Assistant Secretary of State Martin Indyk and Undersecretary of State Stuart Eizenstat to ask for aid to relocate West Bank military bases, build bypass roads for Jewish settlers and beef up security for some settlements.

Nov. 25

• Some 60 members of a Christian cult who disappeared last month from Denver after their leader prophesied the destruction of the city, have turned up in Israel. Israeli police downplayed concerns that the group might attempt mass suicide.

Nov. 26

• Israel and Britain signed a security memorandum to cooperate in defence research.

Nov. 27

• Orthodox legislators in Israel threatened to leave the governing coalition if non-Orthodox representatives are appointed to local religious councils.

Rabbis explain halachah's view of abortion

By ERIC FINGERHUT
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON — Rabbis from the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements spoke out last week about the importance of reducing abortions in the Jewish community.

Citing Jewish law prohibiting abortion except when the mother's life is in danger, they voiced objections to the more liberal interpretation of the Halachah used by many Jewish groups.

The rabbis spoke last week at an all-day conference sponsored by the Institute for Religious Values, a group dedicated to bringing Christians and Jews together to focus attention on public policies that affirm the sanctity of human life.

The rabbis who spoke at the conference, said they were unhappy that so many Jewish groups were so strongly opposed to most restrictions on abortion. "It is unfortunate that Jewish positions on this question are often inaccurately presented by Jews themselves, thus leading to much public confusion among both Jews and non-Jews," said Toronto Rabbi David Novak.

But they also emphasized that Jews do not view abortion through the same prism as traditional anti-abortion groups, which focus on the unborn fetus. "The status of the fetus is not where Judaism enters the debate [on abortion]," said Rabbi Barry Freundel of Kesher Israel, the Georgetown Synagogue. Instead, he said, the debate starts with the status of the mother.

If the mother's life is in serious physical danger, said Rabbi Freundel, then abortion is "not a choice, but a requirement. While the fetus will become a unique human being, it does not intuitively rise to the status of the mother," he said.

Rabbi Novak agreed. "The life of the mother is most proximate to our reach when the baby is still within her body; hence it is preferable to save the most proximate life, rather than the less proximate life or neither life. Then and only then, is abortion not only warranted, but mandated," he said.

But Rabbi Freundel did acknowledge that there were certain rare cases in which the psychological health of the mother would be a valid reason for a woman to have an abortion.

Rabbi Novak also indicated that in some classical rabbinic writings on the subject, "one can note a tendency to extend the principle of maternal threat beyond the original context of direct mortal threat."

Reform Rabbi Clifford Librach of Sharon, Mass., quoted from a Central Conference of American Rabbis document which stated that the Reform movement does "not encourage abortion, nor favor it for trivial reasons, nor sanction it on demand... Indeed, all the Reform [writings] concerning the subject are careful to couch their lenient rulings within the general traditional understanding of the importance of alleviating 'great pain' to the mother. None of them suggest that Judaism should countenance any other reason as a valid basis for abortion."

But can this position on abortion be made into sound public policy? Nathan Diament, who attended the conference, and is director of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America's Institute for Public Affairs, said it is not easy. "The responsible halachic approach to abortion is complex, and does not fit neatly into the categories utilized in the American political debate," he said, noting, for example, that the exemption for psychological health that Rabbi Freundel mentioned is something that anti-abortion groups will not allow, believing it opens too wide a loophole in the law.

Sammie Moshenberg, director of the National Council of Jewish Women's Washington office, said that "there is no need to legislate [on this issue]. Restrictions interfere with a woman's right to make a decision."

She said that women should be able to take their own religious beliefs into account when making a choice to have an abortion, and making anyone's religious law the law of the land would interfere with one's freedom of religion.

Mark Pelavin, associate director of the Religious Action Centre of Reform Judaism, said that the difficulty in defining the "broad concept" of the "life of the mother" makes a "one size fits all" approach unwise.

"Women should be able to make these decisions," Pelavin said. "You can't legislate these situations."

People on both sides of the issue agreed that in an ideal world, abortions would be rare. One segment of the conference was titled Legislative Approaches to Reducing Abortion, and included discussions on informed consent, which would mandate waiting periods and counseling on alternatives to abortion, as well as parental notification when a minor seeks an abortion.

Surviving loss a testament to the human spirit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Naomi Levy's relative youth and ready smile belie her personal and professional authority on grief and the healing process.

The 35-year-old author of To Begin Again: The Journey Toward Comfort, Strength and Faith in Difficult Times was in Toronto recently as part of a book tour. Remarkably, she landed the book contract, her first, on the basis of a few sermons, without having to submit an outline.

To Begin Again is a deft blend of humor, rabbinic wisdom, and instructive tales of healing, told with compassion and an eye for detail.

The book – parts of which are likely to make readers feel they know the author as a friend – has captured interest outside the Jewish community, as evidenced by Rabbi Levy's appearances on the Today Show and Oprah.

Rabbi Naomi Levy

The rabbi agreed not to use her honorific on the cover, hoping to broaden the book's appeal – particularly among disaffected Jews.

"So often I've seen young Jews seek out other faiths for answers, assuming somehow that their own religion didn't possess them," she told The CJN in an interview at Random House offices here.

"The quesion I have tried to answer again and again," she writes, "is not: Why did this happen? But: How will I go on?"

Rabbi Levy writes of congregants who faced addictions, stillbirth, the loss of a young child to cancer, and numerous other challenges.

She is equally open about the premature loss of her father, an early marriage that ended in divorce, and her lesser – but still stressful – day-to-day challenges.

Rabbi Levy's happy childhood in Brooklyn came to an abrupt end at age 15 when her father was shot and killed in a street robbery. Devastated, she began to question her religious beliefs, although she continued to practise "Conservadox" Judaism as she always had.

"My faith was shattered," she said . "It took me a long time to find my way back."

When the Jewish Theological Seminary opened its doors to women in the early 1980s, she was able to fulfil her childhood dream of becoming a rabbi, an outgrowth of the joy she found in Judaism as she was growing up.

Shortly after her ordination, Rabbi Levy accepted a position at Temple Mishkon Tephilo in Venice, Calif., a Los Angeles-area neighborhood, where she led the congregation for seven years before stepping down to devote more time to her two young children.

Inspired by her congregants' ability to emerge stronger, wiser and kinder after facing serious challenges, she felt compelled to write a book exploring the strength of the human spirit.

"For me, it was a fascinating thing that people would come to me seeking my help, but ended up helping me. Watching them grow, change, take risks, and recover from awful things...taught me about the process of healing."

Rabbi Levy herself took what some might consider professional risks. She broke ground as the first female Conservative rabbi to lead a West Coast congregation, and followed her instincts as a spiritual leader, developing new rituals and prayers (some of which are included in the book), and not being afraid to cry with a congregant or offer a hug when she felt it was appropriate.

In To Begin Again, she writes of attending a baby's birth, at the request of the mother, a congregant who Rabbi Levy had helped following a brutal assault and rape several years before on erev Yom Kippur.

"To be able to create out of the labor process, a religious process is a real blessing," she said. "You really appreciate it as a miracle."

She thinks people feel more comfortable sharing their dilemmas and tragedies with her because she is a woman, but being a woman rabbi is a double-edged sword, she noted. Sometimes she feels she is treated with less respect than her male colleagues.

She credits her husband, Robert Eshman (managing editor of the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles) and the joy of family, with counter-balancing the second-hand pain she has had to deal with as a rabbi.

"I'm also lucky enough to be in a congregation a block from the ocean," she added. "Having the blessing of being so close to such a natural site of beauty helped me a lot." Sometimes she would walk with congregants to the ocean; she found it helped them also.

Despite her deeper insights now, Rabbi Levy doesn't think there's much she could say to "that 15-year-old girl who was me."

There's no such thing as perfect healing, she believes, but her book undoubtedly represents a great step in the right direction.

In the Spotlight: In the Toronto of the 1950s, Larry Wiener was a rebellious blond Jewish teenager, listening to rock 'n' roll and hanging out at the Bloor Street YMHA, mostly for the chance to meet girls at dances. But after a teacher told him he'd never amount to much, he decided to accept an offer from the Jewish Agency for an all-expenses-paid trip to Israel to work as a volunteer on Nachal Oz, a kibbutz by the Gaza strip.

Forty years after this misadventure, Wiener, styling himself as a freeloading "Lawrence of Canada," has written a bawdy, comic and picaresque memoir of his experiences as a forever-indifferent convert to Zion. Checkered by intermittent rough-house and romantic interludes, No Flowers On The Desert is Wiener's frank and colorful description of his travels and his time on the kibbutz – from which he eventually went AWOL.

Larry Wiener

Part Casanova and part Don Quixote, Wiener is not the world's greatest writer, and No Flowers on the Desert is padded with many distracting asides. But Hushion House Publishing correctly noticed that the manuscript, which Wiener had initially self-published at 200 copies, possesses enough raw talent and emotion to rate a commercial print run.

Wiener never warmed to Israel and the title reflects his belief that the Promised Land is no place for a happy picnic. At moments, his lack of awareness or empathy for the Jewish state is galling: he's the proverbial Son in the Haggadah Who Doesn't Have the Wherewithal to Ask.

Wiener has been a "Toronto character for over 30 years." You may have seen him as an organ grinder outside Sam the Record Man, or selling books and tee-shirts in the shops he's consecutively managed in Toronto, Niagara Falls and Augusta. He's also designed portfolios for fashion models. Now he's a published author.

An excerpt from No Flowers on the Desert appeared in Outreach, the weekly newspaper of Toronto's street people. The book is 398 pages long, sells for $19.95, and definitely shows talent.

NCSY honors Mirvish

Canada's largest Jewish youth organization is paying tribute to a larger-than-life Canadian personality at its 18th annual concert, Dec. 7.

The Tribute Concert to Ed Mirvish by National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), based in Thornhill, features Mordechai Ben David & Son, and takes place at the Princess of Wales Theatre.

"In Hebrew, the number 18 signifies chai, life," says NCSY Canada director Rabbi Glenn Black. "Virtually no one has contributed to the life of our community like Ed Mirvish."

Mirvish, who will be honored at both a pre-concert reception and during the concert said, "I couldn't think of a better word than life to describe the wonderful work that NCSY does."

NCSY's outreach efforts include classes, counselling, special weekends, drop-in centres and subsidies for teenagers to study in Israel. NCSY also runs ongoing programs for developmentally challenged youngsters, helping them to integrate with the general Jewish community.

To mark this year's special concert, NCSY will be establishing the Ed and Anne Mirvish Israel Scholarship Fund to help young people experience Israel in a caring, educational environment.

Alternative to litigation in resolving disputes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alternative dispute resolution (ADR) has become the growing choice for resolving disputes.

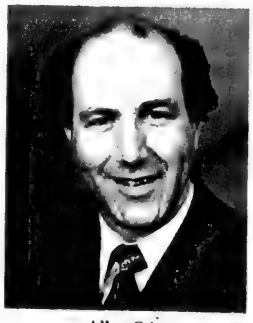
Allan Stitt, who practices mediation, facilitation and ADR systems design with Stitt, Feld, Handy, Houston, is the author of Alternative Dispute Resolution for Organizations: How to design a system for effective conflict resolution (John Wiley & Sons Canada, Ltd.).

"Organizations can design conflict management systems to deal with both internal and external disputes in a way that preserves rather than destroys relationships," says Stitt.

"Instead of resorting to litigation, strikes, work to rule, or withdrawing, disputants can use dispute resolution processes that will resolve their conflict efficiently and effectively."

He adds, conflict is not necessarily bad. "In fact, it is often a necessary catalyst that allows an organization to survive, evolve, and progress in changing times. Therefore, the goal in dealing with conflict is not to eliminate it but to respond to it constructively, rather than destructively."

Stitt says the book is for anyone in an organization who has to deal with or resolve disputes. It was written, he says, to help corporations, non-profit organizations, government and associations follow a proven process for setting up an effective dispute resolution system.



Allan Stitt

The book, written in an easy-to-read, non-legal language, is for human resource professionals, senior managers, boards of directors as well as ADR consultants and lawyers. It covers a variety of disputes – employer/employee conflict, tenant and landlord, family disputes, and disputes between organizations.

The book offers practical tips, case studies, checklists, a step-by-step training guide, and methods of evaluation.

He is an adjunct professor at the U of T Law School, where he teaches courses on conflict management and negotiation.

"When we avoid dealing with conflict, or ignore it, the root problem still exists. Conflict avoidance may provide temporary recess from a stressful situation, and allow people time to rethink their circumstances, but the underlying tension remains, and may resurface.

"Even if it does not resurface, the disputants may be dissatisfied with the outcome and may harbor resentment that will manifest itself later," he says.

Netanyahu vows to lower interest

BY SHARON SADEH, MOTI BASSOK AND BEN ZION CITRIN,
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised last week to take practical measures to lower the interest rate.

Speaking in London, Netanyahu said that the government hopes to live up to its goal regarding inflation, but that more important, it would lower the interest rate to ensure continued growth.

He said the current interest rate "creates a problem" and that he would deal with the issue in discussions on economic policy to be held this week, with a view to reaching a decision enabling the interest rate to be lowered.

The prime minister noted that although Israel's economy depends on world events outside its control, it also depends on factors that are in the government's control. That is where the focus will be placed, Netanyahu added.

In response to the prime minister's remarks in London, treasury officials said that in Sunday's cabinet meeting, Finance Minister Yaakov Ne'eman and senior ministry officials will not propose a revision of the interest rate.

Supplying water a key part of Jerusalem's history

By HEIKE ZAUN-GOSHEN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Deep below the ground, two groups of workers kept digging feverishly from opposite ends. The men started calling out across the remaining rock barrier as they approached each other.

It was a dramatic moment when they finally broke through. A 530-metre long, winding underground tunnel had been completed underneath ancient Jerusalem's foundations, providing something that will always be crucial to the city's survival: a steady supply of clean, fresh water.

That was almost 3,000 years ago.

For a long time, the Gihon spring down in the Kidron Valley, at the foot of the Temple Mount, remained Jerusalem's main source of fresh water. In the eighth-century BCE, King Hiskia had the tunnel dug through the mountain, thus hiding the water's course in case of a siege.

This tunnel improved a simpler canal built by the Jebusites, which led water underneath the walls into the city. Inside, they had carved a 13-metre shaft from which water was drawn with pails. It was through this shaft that David and his men entered the town around 1000 BCE and conquered it.

Hiskia's more sophisticated tunnel fed the waters to the Pool of Siloam, which served as the city's water reservoir.

During the Arab siege, the pipeline to Jerusalem was cut, forcing women to bring in well-water, supplied to the city from trucks.

It was only in 1881 that a curious school boy discovered the ancient inscription carved into the conduit's rock. With six laconic lines in Hebrew, the elated miners had commemorated their excitement of more than 2½ millennia ago.

"The tunnel...this is the history of its cutting. When yet (the hewers were lifting) the pick, each toward his fellow and when yet there were still three cubits to be bored, the voice of a man calling to his fellow was heard, for there was resonance coming from both north and south... And when the tunnel was driven throughout, the quarrymen struck, one against the other, pick against pick, and the water flowed from the spring." (Jerusalem – City of Mirrors by Amos Elon).

After an attempt by a local dealer of antiquities to steal the inscription, the Turkish authorities confiscated it, and today it can be admired in Istanbul's Museum of Archeology.

Until the beginning of the 20th century, Jerusalem's water supply virtually depended on natural sources such as the springs, and on the precipitation collected and stored in private and communal cisterns.

Consequently, wells, water pumps and fountains, cisterns and pools, held, until very recently, a predominant position in the city's urban fabric.

Remains of the city's historic water supply and storage systems, from large pools hewn into the rock during antiquity, to the aquaducts implemented by the Romans, to Turkish bathouses and large communal cisterns, can still be seen today.

From the early days of photography, meaningful pictures depict cisterns and pumps in neighborhood courtyards, and picturesque water carriers from the villages dotting the hills. It was these water carriers, who, in times of draught, brought water to the city, held in sheepskin jars or canisters, and sold to Jerusalem's thirsty inhabitants.

Even when Jerusalem's New City emerged outside the ancient city walls during the second half of the 19th century, sufficient water supply remained problematic. But a new awareness began developing. This is especially reflected in the books of regulations every newly founded community issued. There were strict rules on how to keep the water, as well as its cisterns and storage pools, clean and healthy.

But it was only after the British took over from the Turks after WWII that modern supply systems were introduced to the city. And it was towards the end of the British mandate that the importance of the precious liquid became cruelly apparent.

Only strict rationing, paired with an enormous staying power, ensured sufficient supply during the Arab siege of Jewish Jerusalem in 1948. Ever since, Jerusalemites are peculiar about the use of water, especially when used for recreational purposes. Public fountains and swimming pools, which elsewhere in Israel are an integral part of everyday life, are a rare thing in Jerusalem.

Yehuda Amichai, modern Hebrew poet and resident of the city, makes an according statement.

I am a Jerusalemite. Swimming pools with/their voices and their noises are not part of my soul/
The dust is my conscious, the stone my subconscious/
And all my memories are closed courtyards/at summer's high noon.

(From Hazman, by Amichai Yehuda.)

Information on possible unclaimed insurance proceeds of Holocaust victims and heirs — Toll-free telephone service

Canada's life and health insurers have established a dedicated, toll-free telephone information service, in both English and French, to assist anyone seeking information on possible unclaimed insurance proceeds owing to victims and survivors of the Holocaust and their heirs.

This service is being offered through the Consumer Assistance Centre of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association, which for many years has responded to life and health insurance inquiries, including requests for policy searches.

Although Canadian life insurance companies did not operate in continental Europe during the years 1930 to 1945, it is nonetheless possible that Canadian insurers operating in other countries, such as the United Kingdom for example, could have sold policies insuring people who subsequently became victims of the Holocaust.

The objective of the new service is to assist callers by putting them in touch with such a Canadian insurer, or, as appropriate, putting them in touch with other organizations in the U.S. and elsewhere which have been set up to assist the heirs of Holocaust victims, and Holocaust survivors, locate possible unclaimed insurance policies on a worldwide basis.

The service is staffed by knowledgeable industry retirees who will make every effort to be of assistance. They can be reached at the numbers shown below, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. EST Monday through Friday. After these hours, it is possible to leave a message which will be answered promptly the next business day.

Chanukah Gifts

Plenty of books for winter reading by the fire

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

This holiday season, there's a wide selection of newly published books, both fiction and non-fiction, which reflect diverse aspects of Canada's multifaceted Jewish community from coast to coast. What follows are capsule reviews of seven recent titles to consider as Chanukah gifts.

Anyone who grew up Jewish in Montreal should appreciate Regine Robin's impressionistic novel The Wanderer, which won the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for Fiction at last year's Jewish Book Awards.

Robin uses a vivid stream-of-consciousness technique to relate the experiences of a French-speaking Jewish woman who tries to fit into Montreal society but is haunted by memories of the Holocaust and various personal problems.

The book is filled with both the sights and sounds of modern Montreal as well of the shtetl. It is peopled with postwar Montrealers as well an array of personalities from Jewish history and letters, including the 17th-century false messiah Shabbetai Tzvi.

The prose has the postmodern poetic flavor of Allen Ginsberg or Carl Sandburg as it conveys, for example, the realizations that its Jewish, French-speaking protagonist must attend an English-speaking school to be spared a religious education in a French Roman Catholic school, and that in any case she will never be truly accepted as a Quebecois.

Originally published in French as La Quebecoite, the book retains its French flavor in the fine English translation by Phyllis Aronoff. (Alter Ego Editions, $17.95.)

Novelist Howard Norman of Vermont has produced The Museum Guard, capturing a tale that unfolds in Halifax on the eve of World War II. The protagonist, DeFoe Russet, works with his uncle as a guard in a small museum and by evening woos Imogen Linny, caretaker of the small local Jewish cemetery.

As war clouds darken Europe's horizons, Imogen becomes obsessed with a Dutch painting, Jewess On A Street in Amsterdam, which has recently arrived in the museum. She retreats into the painting even as Amsterdam itself becomes a place that is unsafe for Jews.

An American, Norman has used Canada as a setting for several novels. (Knopf Canada, $32.95.)

Arthur Schaller's absorbing memoir, 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka, recounts his experiences as an 11-year old with his mother and younger brother in the Warsaw Ghetto. Making a daring escape, Schaller posed as a Catholic orphan for three years, working as an itinerant farm-hand to avoid detection.

The author, who immigrated to Toronto in 1948, has waited 50 years to tell his story, which resounds with simple faith in humanity despite the horrors he witnessed. (Malcolm Lester Books; $26.95.)

If you open Mordecai Richler's latest collection of essays expecting leftovers and twice-warmed-over tales, you're in for a surprise. Belling the Cat: Essays, Reports & Opinions is Richler at his freshest. He's funny, irreverent, intelligent and – yes, even charming. Whether the subject is the Bronfmans, the Reichmanns, Woody Allen or Saul Bellow, his prose is compellingly readable.

Although I'm not always keen on Richler's fiction, I readily acknowledge that he's a fine raconteur with an ironic wit that is superbly adapted to magazine writing. (Many of these 27 pieces were originally published in the New Yorker, GQ, Saturday Night and other magazines.) Like his various well-trained editors, I'd gladly buy him a drink or two, just to keep the stories coming. (Knopf Canada, $32.)

With Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community, historian Gerald Tulchinsky completes the two-part study launched in his earlier work, Taking Root. Whereas the first book covers the period from about 1760 to 1920, Branching Out's nearly 355 textual pages deal with the period from the 1920s to the present.

Tulchinsky, a professor of history at Queen's University, examines Jewish immigration in the post-World-War-I era, the "great Jewish metier" of the shmatah trade, the dual attractions for socialism and Zionism, and the concurrent strains of anti-Semitism in Canadian society.

He also looks at Canada's Jews at war, how the influx of refugees affected the community after the Holocaust, and the countervailing pressures of assimilation and the need to maintain Jewish identity in contemporary society. Branching Out also celebrates the accomplishments of many famous individuals who are part of today's 360,000-strong Jewish community, which represents only about one percent of the Canadian population. (Stoddart, $45.)

In its 75 years of operation, Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital has touched many thousands of lives and become a leader in patient care and medical research.

From Generation to Generation: A History of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, by Lesley Marrus Barsky, is a full-fledged, affectionate account of an institution that began in order to serve the growing medical needs of Toronto's Jewish community, and has branched out to serve the entire city.

In telling Mount Sinai's story, Marrus Barsky has tapped into a rich vein of Toronto Jewish communal history. (McClelland & Stewart, $40.)

Voices from the Heart: A Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel is an outpouring of love from Toronto's Jewish community to the Jewish state. Lavishly illustrated, this thick coffee-table book contains personal tributes, poignant reminiscences and lively anecdotes from hundreds of Toronto Jews, including many of the city's "movers and shakers."

Editors Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman have done a superb job at preserving the respective character of each literary voice—which collectively mingle together like a holy chorus to sing out the praises of Israel. (McClelland & Stewart, $50.)

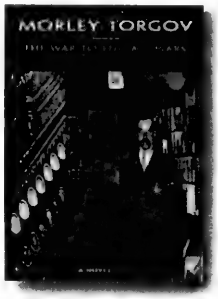
Torgov novel reflects subtle humor, lightness of style

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In Morley Torgov's new novel, The War to End All Wars, two Jews who had faced each other as soldiers in the opposing Russian and German armies of World War I, confront each other again as clothing merchants in a no-holds-barred commercial battle in Oreville, Michigan, in the 1920s.

Sitting in his elegant apartment in midtown Toronto, Torgov says he began writing the novel immediately after seeing a documentary about Jewish life in prewar Europe and realizing that Jews had fought on opposite sides in World War I.



His father, born in the Kamenets-Podolsk region of Ukraine, had served in the Russian army for 2½ years before defecting – which is precisely the course of action of the novel's protagonist, Eliezer Pinsky, who becomes Elliot Pines in America.

A two-time Leacock medal winner, Torgov's latest novel reflects a subtle humor and lightness of style, qualities that also mark its predecessors. Although dark things happen in the book, the prose is never heavy or overburdened. Torgov agrees with this reader's assessment that his writing style is "accessible," and cites Isaac Bashevis Singer, Joseph Heller and Philip Roth as major influences.

"I have difficulty looking at any subject with what Woody Allen used to call 'total heavy-osity,' he says. "I can't stand prose that is dense and steeped in that 'total heavy-osity.'

"One of my literary idols is Elmore Leonard, who said one of the most clever things I've ever heard a writer say. In an interview he was asked, 'To what do you attribute the success of your prose?' He replied, 'I leave out the parts people don't read.'"

Even though Torgov's latest story unfolds in the small town that is also characteristic of his other novels such as A Good Place to Come From and The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick, he argues convincingly that the adjective "folksy" does not apply to either the writing or the characters.

"Writing about small-town people doesn't necessarily entail folksy writing," he says. "Small-town people have a way of nosing into each other's lives, and even lacerating each other, that is anything but folksy. I don't look on small-town life with a romantic eye."

Born 71 years ago into the small Jewish community of Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., Torgov is a partner in a Richmond St. law office, where he still maintains a full working schedule. Each workday except Friday, he normally takes a brief nap after work, then puts in another two or three hours on his writing.

"On holidays I'll write longer at the cottage," he says. "But at my age, I don't have the energy to do an all-night writing session like I used to."

While each of his five novels centre principally around Jewish characters, their appeal is universal, and many non-Jewish readers have told him that they identify with his characters and their problems with identity and assimilation.

"I was flabbergasted after my first book came out – A Good Place to Come From – and I got cards and letters from many people saying that my experience had been just like theirs as a Catholic or a Ukrainian in a small town," he says.

While Torgov is "always conscious" of his Jewish identity, "I wouldn't want to waste time on trying to determine whether I'm a Jewish-Canadian writer or a Canadian-Jewish writer... I'm very comfortable being Jewish. I wouldn't want to be anything else – except maybe Italian. I love the language and the food."

The War To End All Wars was a challenge to write, he says. He began it in 1981 and worked on it intermittently for the next 17 years, consigning it to a drawer for years at a time while he finished other books. He honed out its chapters in chronological order and rewrote each paragraph more than a dozen times before handing over the final manuscript to his literary agent Beverly Slopen and Toronto publisher Malcolm Lester in 1997.

"The reason this was the most difficult book for me to write is that it is a plot-driven book—all my other books were more character-driven," he says. "I don't know where I'm going when I start a book. But if you really know your characters and there's enough conflict between them, they'll carry the story forward. That's how it worked for me."

The War To End All Wars is published by Malcolm Lester Books and sells for $26.95.

CD includes traditional chassidic tunes, niggunim

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Andy Statman Quartet
The Hidden Light
Sony Records

The Hidden Light, a new CD by the acclaimed Andy Statman Quartet, is a lovely and evocative collection of 13 melodies performed by Statman, an acclaimed mandolin and clarinet virtuoso from Brooklyn, and pianist Bruce Barth, percussionist Bob Weiner and acoustic bass player Scott Lee.

Many of these pieces are arrangements of traditional chassidic tunes and niggunim, spiritual melodies meant to intensify prayer.

Several are original Statman compositions. Although the unenlightened might note the obvious resemblance to klezmer music, especially in Statman's beguiling clarinet, he defines the collection as "chassidic music, not klezmer music. I don't like to use the word 'klezmer.' It becomes very limiting."

If there could be a marriage between Jewish music and jazz, the Statman quartet would be the musicians chosen to perform at the wedding.

The opening tune is an uncommon version of the traditional Lecha Dodi with which the Breslover Chassidim usher in the Sabbath. Other songs celebrate the Sabbath and various mystical aspects of chassidic tradition, including the parah adumah or red heifer that is supposed to appear as a prelude to the messianic age.

Several tunes are written by revered rabbis of ages past, redeemed from obscurity by the musical Modzitz Congregation in Brooklyn, with which Statman has long been associated. A Russian Waltz written by Statman, evokes the wind blowing across the steppes.

This CD is black-hat jazz, loyal to its origins yet informed with the cadences and nuances of contemporary artists like Keith Jarrett, Charles Mingus and Chick Corea.

"Andy wants to be faithful to the emotional intent of the melodies," says Dovid Sears, a Brooklyn Chassid who has helped guide Statman through the world of chassidic music.

"He wants to take a trip with the music and he wants to use jazz as a vehicle for the trip. At the same time he wants to go into the melodies themselves, deeper and deeper. So it's a very traditional thing and yet also a very experimental thing."

Statman, 47, began his musical career three decades ago as a virtuoso mandolin player known for his affinity to bluegrass. Born to secular Jewish parents, he became an observant Jew in the early 1980s and through live performance and a handful of CDs has won a hallowed place on the cutting edge of the neo-klezmer revival.

In recent years he was among the artists chosen to play with famed Israeli violinist Yitzhak Perlman on two bestselling CDs, In the Fiddler's House, Part I and II, in celebration of klezmer. Statman has also been planning to release A Shabbos in Nashville, a CD of Jewish music interpreted in a country-bluegrass mode.

In the meantime, lovers of klezmer and chassidic music are bound to be pleased with In the Hidden Light, which is available on the Sony label.

Judith Cohen
Dans Mon Chemin J'ai rencontré
Transit Productions

Musical purists with a love of folklore and Jewish and other ethnic music may find much to enjoy in Dans Mon Chemin J'ai Rencontré... (On My Way I Met...), a CD by Toronto ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen.

A specialist in antiquated instruments with a working knowledge of many languages, Cohen has travelled far and wide to assemble this collection of 21 songs. She sings them with her daughter, Tamar with musical backup from Rob Simms. She presents multiple versions of many of the songs as though they were Childe ballads, which in some respects they resemble.

While the title song is Acadian from Maritime French settlers of two centuries ago, others originate in Bulgaria, England, France, Turkey, Bosnia, Spanish Galicia, Italy and Greece. Numerous pieces are of Jewish provenance, such as La Reine Captive (The Captive Queen), which Cohen presents from four different sources, in Moroccan Judeo-Spanish, Bosnian Judeo-Spanish, Catalan and Spanish.

As Cohen explains in the liner notes, La Reine Captive has been traced back to "a medieval French narrative poem, which in turn goes back to a story from the 1001 Nights." In her travels, Cohen recorded the song's various versions from descendants of the Jews expelled from the Iberian peninsula.

In Adonde Vais, Senor Yitzhak (Where Are You Going, Senor Yitzhak?) the senor, who is on a religious pilgrimage, sings out all the names of the towns he plans to visit, each with its own venerated rabbi. The song came from Morocco.

Der Gitarre is a Yiddish song in which a young girl sings of her lover's betrayal, while Shlof Mayn Kind is a Yiddish lullaby—only slightly more soothing—in which a mother warns her baby of the sad realities of life.

Dans Mon Chemin J'ai Rencontre... is certain to appeal to musicologists and other lovers of folk music who require only musical and historical purity, without any dazzling musicianship or elaborate production techniques.

The CD, which won the Prix Marcel Blouin SRC for its musical program, is recorded on the Transit-Radio-Canada label.

Uncanny parallels link books by talented writers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Two of Canada's foremost Jewish writers have published collections of essays this year and though each book is strikingly original, there are uncanny parallels between them.

Either volume would make an appropriate Chanukah gift for anyone with a special interest in literature, especially related to Jewish and Holocaust themes.

Void & Voice: Essays on Literary and Historical Currents, by Kenneth Sherman, opens with two short gem-like reminiscences, The Tailor Shop and Silver Braids, recalling the author's grandfather and grandmother, respectively.

Early in the century, Sherman's grandfather opened Sherman Custom Tailors at College and Bathurst streets in Toronto, an establishment that brims with life for Sherman, since he spent his early childhood there and in the tiny apartment upstairs. He writes of these premises and the characters that inhabited them with the succinct narrative power of a Bernard Malamud.

Silver Braids describes a grandmother who lived on the edge of madness, driven mute by personal tragedy. Here, already, one sees the two poles of Sherman's organizing thesis, void and voice. The next two essays, which focus on the author's specific experiences in Poland (at Auschwitz) and Israel (Jerusalem), expand this polarity. Poland, the land of death, represents a gaping void; Israel represents redemption and life beyond the suffering – yet it still contains silences.

These four essays comprise Sherman's personalized preface. What follows is a series of essays on literature and culture – usually but not exclusively Jewish. Sherman's eclectic eye focuses on a wide range of cultural artifacts from Schindler's List to the works of Primo Levi, A.M. Klein, H.G. Wells and Rupert Brooke.

Sherman is interested in the interplay between literature and history and "how historical necessity alters people's writing style and the content that they're dealing with," he says.

Kabbalah

According to the Toronto poet-essayist, who has previously published some 10 books of poetry, the contrast between void and voice is a fundamental part of Jewish thought. "Lurianic philosophy and the Kabbalah are also concerned with void and voice," he says. "The Kabbalah says that God retreated from the universe, compelling man to create something, and that's where creativity comes from. It's a very Jewish concept."

Void & Voice is published by Mosaic and sells for $16.95.

In A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory, Norman Ravvin brings a personal level to a collection of scholarly essays that are mostly about Jewish literature. In the introduction, he briefly describes his grandfather's experience as an itinerant shochet or ritual slaughterer on the Prairies in the 1930s.

Author of Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish, an acclaimed book of short stories published in 1997, Ravvin in his newest publication focuses on Canadian writers such as Eli Mandel, Leonard Cohen, Mordecai Richler and Chava Rosenfarb, as well as Americans like Philip Roth, Nathanael West and Saul Bellow.

A House of Words offers nine literary essays, all written in a personal voice. "I make use of my own family background and my own connection with European Jewish history to help me investigate Jewish literature," Ravvin explains.

One of his interests seems to be in interpreting Jewish mainstream writers like Cohen, Richler and Roth in a more Jewish context than most scholars concede. "I often find a deep lack of knowledge of the role of Jewishness in Jewish literature, and I hope that my reading will go some distance in changing that," he says.

Ravvin, a literature professor at the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, also attempts to show how historical memories inform the lives of Jewish characters created by Jewish authors to a degree not widely acknowledged by critics. For instance, he observes:

"Even Leonard Cohen, a master of the contemporary, a genius at turning pop iconography to serious ends, cannot keep the spectre of the past from haunting his most carnivalesque fiction."

A House of Words is published by McGill-Queens and sells for $15.95.

Author shares her enthusiasm in creating children's stories

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A good picture book will appeal to anyone from age 5 to 97, says Toronto children's author Frieda Wishinsky.

Her latest book, Each One Special, is the story of a cake decorator who loses his job after 35 years, because the new owner of the bakery where he works wants speed and quantity, not "each one special."

Harry the cake decorator is dejected until his young friend Ben seeks his help with modeling clay, and Harry discovers a new outlet for his creativity.

The book, published by British Columbia-based Orca Book Publishers, and whimsically illustrated by H. Werner Zimmermann, was inspired by Wishinsky's late father, Herman Reches, a ceramicist and former cake decorator, who was artist-in-residence at the Koffler School of Visual Art.

Unlike the fictional Harry, Reches kept busy after his retirement. "I don't remember him ever saying, 'What should I do with myself?' I think he knew himself enough, to know he wasn't going to sit around," recalled Wishinsky in a recent interview.

Frieda Wishinsky

The themes of Each One Special will resonate with people of a variety of temperaments, backgrounds and ages.

"When one door closes, another door opens," mused the author, sitting over coffee at a table graced with her father's clay flowers displayed in a glass candy dish. "[The book] is about frustration, about not giving up."

Wishinsky, a mother of two, knows about opening new doors. Her husband, a Toronto physician, decided, in his late 20s, to leave the computer field and enter medical school. She herself worked until a few years ago as a special education teacher.

She began writing in earnest over 10 years ago, and has also published freelance magazine articles and educational books.

Her previous books include Oonga Boonga, Why Can't You Fold Your Pants Like David Levine, Jennifer Jones Won't Leave Me Alone and Crazy for Chocolate.

Wishinsky thinks writing children's books is a great way to deal with life issues, even if her books aren't autobiographical. "You can really get to the heart of it," she said.

Children's authors don't necessarily write for children, she explained. "You write because you want to write. You write for the kid you were, for the kid you still are, and for the feelings you have."

She devotes five half-days a week to her writing and, in a pinch, can write just about anywhere. Having grown up in New York, where she attended Jewish day school and later, City University and Yeshiva University to study international relations and special education respectively – she has no trouble tuning out the noises of a subway or a coffee shop.

Born in a DP camp in Germany in the late 1940s, she emigrated with her parents at the age of 8 months. As an adult she lived for a year in Israel, where she started a reading clinic in Ramat Gan.

Although her stories may incorporate lessons about life, she hates the thought that anyone might consider them didactic. "I don't think good stories are ever didactic. My intention is to share my enthusiasm for the story," she said, adding somewhat ruefully, "I'm sure once a teacher, always a teacher."

Holiday books a delicious treat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Finding the appropriate Chanukah gift can be a challenge. You want to get something the children will enjoy, something that will help them appreciate that Chanukah is not only about latkes, and something that the kids won't lose interest in before the evening is over.

Books are perfect.

Here are a few suggestions. These books are written, illustrated and produced well enough, that adults will enjoy snuggling up with their children, grandchildren, nieces or nephews to work off the latkes with a good read.

One of my favorites is The Borrowed Hanukkah Latkes, by Linda Glaser, illustrated by Nancy Cote (General Publishing, 1997).

Rachel is helping her mother prepare latkes for the ever-growing number of guests coming for Chanukah dinner. Everything is going fine – until they run out of potatoes and eggs. So Rachel runs over to the next-door neighbor.

Mrs. Greenberg is happy to give the family what they need, but refuses to come herself to the party, saying she doesn't want to be a bother.

How Rachel manages to persuade Mrs. Greenberg to join the Chanukah celebrations is both ingenious and touching.

Hot off the press is When Mindy Saved Hanukkah, by Eric A. Kimmel, with illustrations by Barbara McClintock (Scholastic Press, 1998).

It tells of a family of teeny tiny people who live behind the walls of the historic Eldridge Street Synagogue in New York. When the father sneaks into the synagogue sanctuary to get a spare Chanukah candle that was in the aron kodesh, he discovers to his dismay that the premises are now guarded by a giant (to him) cat. Mindy and her grandfather, following in the footsteps of the brave Maccabees, overcome the danger, and save the situation.

This delightful book is not only enjoyable for the story, although that is excellent. It is full of humor, (Zayde distracts the cat with a slingshot of pickled herring), and the warmth of family, friends and holidays.

It is often difficult to realize the beauty in very ordinary things. In The Ugly Menorah, by Marissa Moss (Farrer, Straus & Giroux, 1996), a little girl learns that love and caring are more precious than silver or gold.

Rachel is spending the first Chanukah after her beloved grandfather dies, with her grandmother. Even though she is sitting in her Grandpa's chair, she is sad that she can't feel him near her.

When Grandma brings out her menorah, a plain wooden board with tin cylinders to hod the candles, Rachel is disappointed because it is so plain.

But after she is told the story of how Grampa made it with his own hands, and Grandma lights the menorah, Rachel realizes how beautiful it is, and "for the first time since Grandpa died, she felt he was with her again."

The Magic Dreidels, by Eric Kimmel, with illustrations by Katya Drenina (Holiday House, 1996), is a Chanukah version of a well-known folk tale.

Everyone in Jacob's family is busily preparing for the holiday, except Jacob, who is playing with his new brass dreidel. When his mother sends him to the well to get some water, he drops the dreidel into the well.

A goblin who lives in the well gives him first a wooden dreidel that spins out latkes, then a silver one that spins out Chanukah gelt. When Jacob gets home, however, he discovers that the magic dreidels don't do anything magic at all.

What happened?

The Kugel Valley Klezmer Band, by Joan Betty Stuchner and Richard Row (North Winds Press, 1998), is set in a small valley in the Canadian Maritimes. Ten-year old Shira has only one dream – to be able to play the fiddle in her father's klezmer band.

Her father insists that she can't play with the band, because she is a girl, and anyway she hasn't had any lessons.

Shira insists that in Canada, anything is possible, so she sets out to teach herself to play the fiddle.

She keeps her new skills secret. Then one Chanukah night, the Kugel Valley Klezmer Band's fiddler gets sick. Someone must step in and save the band's reputation. But who?

A lot of youngsters like to make special crafts on Chanukah (and any other holiday too, for that matter). They will get a kick out of Hanukkah Fun; great things to make and do, by Judy Bastyra and Catherine Ward (Kingfisher, 1996).

It is full of ideas for different kinds of chanukiot, dreidels, latkes, oils and even candles. There are very clear, detailed instructions and drawings, and the book even suggests when you should call an adult for help.

Air Hogs go far

By JOSEPH SERGE
Supplements Editor

One of the best toys released this year has a novelty that all parents will enjoy – it doesn't require batteries.

Air Hogs, released by Spin Master Toys, is an air-powered toy plane that can fly the length of a football field. Relying solely on air-power, it requires no gas, batteries or rubber bands, and is safe and easy to use.

The Air Hogs is powered with an engine. "That makes the experience so much more real," says Ben Varadi, vice-president of product development at Spin Master. "The only difference between Air Hogs and the old model planes is that the Air Hogs engine is powered by air. The engine sounds like a gas engine and propels the plane over 100 yards."

After the plane's flight, all you have to do is pump the plane up with a pump that comes included and you're ready to fly again.

The Air Hog is all but assembled (just slap on the wings), and includes a spare set of wings.

Be advised to use this outdoors and in a large playing area. While I found it does meet the company's boast of flying 100 yards, it is extremely sensitive to wind and doesn't always stick to any flight course you may desire.

Spin Master recommends the toy for children 8 and over.

Success in network marketing a tough grind

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Each year, companies seek agents to sell the thousands of new products they are introducing to the marketplace.

Through multi-level, or network marketing (MLM), the agents and the companies can find each other.

MLM involves the promotion and distribution of products by independent agents, who also recruit new agents.

Gavin Herman became involved in multi-level marketing when his accountant of 15 years sent him a video and written materials.

"I was suitably impressed. We met over coffee where I learned of his thorough investigation of the company. I was looking for a new venture at the time, so I decided to join and make a go of it," he says.

Herman is one of 100,000 North American distributors selling for the Japanese firm Nikken, which markets a variety of total wellness products, including special mattresses, skin care products, nutrients and pet products.

Mitch Perry of Vancouver sells for Watkins, a home products distribution company that also carries a selection of kosher items. A friend signed Perry up and even paid for the start-up kit.

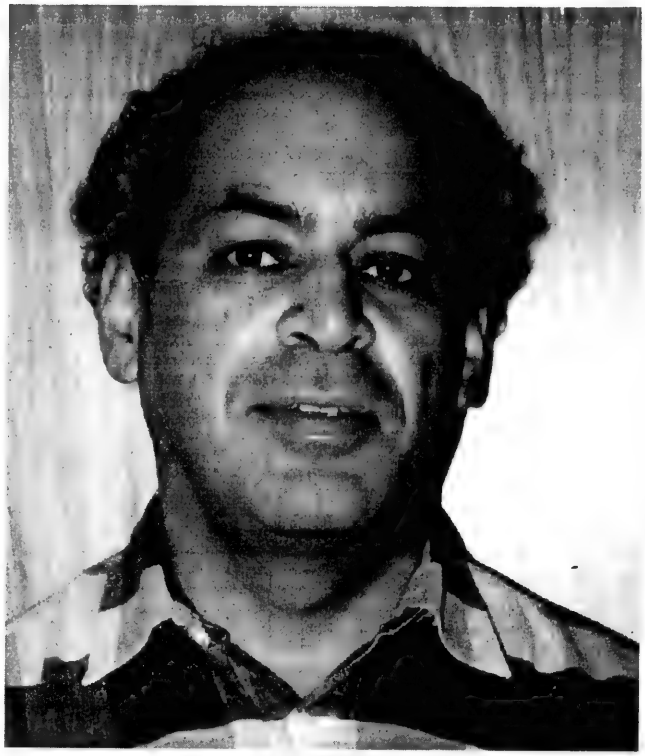
"I fooled around with it, doing it here and there. Then I dropped it, but for some reason I kept up my membership in Watkins. A customer came to me in August 1995, and placed a small order. I called all my old customers back and they all wanted to buy," says Perry.

There are a number of advantages to multi-level marketing: entrepreneurs have a low overhead; stores or extensive advertising are not required; and MLM distributors are paid on a performance basis – if they don't sell, they don't get paid.

MLM also weeds out the middle person, which eliminates costs associated with warehousing requirements.

The industry, however, does have its down side. Many people see it as being associated with pyramid schemes. Some MLM organizations predict unrealistic returns and structure a growth strategy based on using, rather than working with other sellers.

One former multi-level marketing representative, who worked for three or four years in a number of organizations and asked not to be identified, says that the industry is a rough and tumble business.



Gavin Herman

"It works for a few people. For the majority of people that get involved, the industry does not work. That's the bottom line. There is a lot of heartache and tremendous headache for a good number of people. For the few people whose dreams are fulfilled, its like winning a lottery.

"Part of their gospel is 'If you do this, you will have all the freedom in the world.' [I had] meetings almost every night, and long distance phone calls all over North America, if not all over the world...Constantly, you have to harass people to join up...Where's the freedom?"

Another former multi-level marketer, who sold various diet and health products, says that she doesn't recommend it to anyone.

"People made it sound really great. Most people who went into it were in dreamland. If some made money, others lost. The worst part is the amount of people you bring under. The people under you usually lose money," she says.

Herman warns all potential participants to do their homework before proceeding. "For those looking at similar opportunities, they should check out the people. This is very much a relationship business; one must know who they are going to work with. The company and the industry must also be investigated. Are they on an upward growth pattern, or in a stable or declining industry?

"Finally, one should study the industry of network marketing to get a full appreciation of its power, growth and potential."

Any MLM program that pays only for recruiting, and has no actual product to sell, will eventually fail if new members stop joining.

One key test is determining whether a sales representative can make money at the first level, without recruiting others into the sales process.

When asked how he overcomes the negative image of multi-level marketing, Perry points out that one must accept that everything is a pyramid.

"Even mutual funds are based on a residual to the manager and sellers. The more sales and customers, the higher your income. What's the difference?" asks Perry, pointing out that many organizations work in a pyramid format.

Perry says that people in the industry should explain to the "skeptics" that buying through him is the same as buying through a mail order company.

As a multi-level marketing organization grows, new marketing representatives must have the skills and support necessary to move products, and stay with the program. Due primarily to poor prospecting, most network marketers never get to this goal .

Perry is optimistic about direct selling in a multi-level marketing environment. "Networking is the buzzword of the '90s for success in business or any other activity. I am in the referral business. I go to a movie, read a book, go to a restaurant, and tell people how good it is. But I don't get paid for it. I show people how they can save time and money when they do their shopping – things they are doing or buying now, and I do get paid for it."

Herman's views are similar. "I do not see any drawbacks to this approach of doing business. You could purchase almost anything – from cars to soap – in this fashion."

But multi-level marketing is not for everyone. "The biggest problem people have is being able to realize their own potential. If one appreciates that this is not a get-rich-quick scheme, that with proper application one can make a lot of money, in a relatively short period of time, then it truly allows anyone to dream," says Herman.

Not all products will sell with a multi-level marketing approach. Ideally, products must be in both current and long-term demand. The best products are those which customers will place repeat orders such as health products.

CANDLE LIGHTING

THE CHANUKAH CANDLES ARE LIT AT SUNDOWN. THE SHAMAS, SOMETIMES CALLED THE HELPER CANDLE, IS RAISED ABOVE THE OTHER CANDLES IN THE MENORAH AND IS LIT FIRST. WE USE THE SHAMAS TO LIGHT THE OTHER CANDLES. EACH NIGHT AS YOU FACE THE MENORAH, WE PLACE THE CANDLES FROM RIGHT TO LEFT. ON THE FIRST NIGHT WE PLACE THE FIRST CANDLE ON THE FAR RIGHT. ON THE SECOND NIGHT AN ADDITIONAL CANDLE IS PLACED TO THE LEFT OF THE FIRST ONE AND THIS IS REPEATED UNTIL THE 8 NIGHTS ARE COMPLETED. THE CANDLES ARE ARRANGED FROM RIGHT TO LEFT, BUT THEY ARE LIT FROM LEFT TO RIGHT. WHEN SHABBAT COINCIDES WITH CHANUKAH, THE SHABBAT CANDLES ARE LIT AFTER THE CHANUKAH LIGHTS.

Chanukah Hi-lights

THE HEBREW WORD CHANUKAH MEANS "DEDICATION." IT CELEBRATES THE JEWISH PEOPLE'S VICTORY FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. JUDAH MACCABEE LED THE BATTLE AGAINST THE SYRIANS AND SUCCEEDED IN DEFEATING THEM. UNFORTUNATELY, THE SACRED TEMPLE WAS DESTROYED BY THE SYRIANS. THE WORD "CHANUKAH" OR "DEDICATION," REFERS TO THE REDEDICATION OF THE ANCIENT TEMPLE OF WHICH THE JEWISH PEOPLE CLEANSED AND RESTORED TO ITS ORIGINAL CONDITION. THE MIRACLE HAPPENED WHEN THE ETERNAL FLAME STAYED LIT FOR EIGHT DAYS WITH ONLY ONE DAY'S SUPPLY OF OIL.

Book's hero a young girl

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It is very hard, sometimes, to appreciate being Jewish when it looks like the world around us is so much more exciting and glamorous.

That is exactly how Anya, the heroine of Candles, by Lynne Kositsky (Roussan Publishers Inc., 1998), feels. She resents that her home is "more old-Jewish than new Canadian," that her family doesn't do all the Christmassy things that her friends do, and that she is not allowed to join them, especially during Chanukah.

She is very resentful when her grandmother gives her brother a portable CD player, while she gives her an old (and to Anya old-fashioned) menorah.

Grudgingly agreeing to light the menorah to please her family, Anya finds herself being dragged backwards in time, and transformed into Estie, a young Jewish girl in Nazi Germany.

Each time Anya lights the menorah, she experiences more and more of Estie's life.

Estie's parents, afraid because of what the Nazis were doing to the Jews, arranged for Estie to be smuggled out of Germany by a brave and kind non-Jewish friend.

She reaches England, where she lives out the war years. Eventually, she comes to Canada, where she is reunited with her mother and sister, who have survived the war, and with Inge, a girl who had been her best friend until Hitler came to power.

Through living Estie's life, Anya realizes, as she herself admits, what it means to be a Jew.

Unlike some books for pre-teens, Anya is a normal girl – she loves her family, but she finds them, particularly her brother, totally exasperating; she hates her hair; she wants to be just like her friends. She is neither a goody-goody, nor a complete horror.

You will certainly enjoy the parts of the book that talk about the family's two golden retrievers, Jesse and Angel, who get into everything, eat the heads off flowers and, while loveable, are simply not too bright.

Richman honored for lifetime of sports excellence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Ruby Richman hasn't played competitive basketball for a few years, and he's more than 30 years removed from his hoops heyday, he's still involved in the sport.

At 64, Richman is busy organizing a world master's tournament to bring together a group of seasoned athletes for an international tournament in Ontario sometime around the fall of 1999. There's a good chance he'll lace up his playing shoes to participate in the over-60 competition.

When he's not busy organizing events, he likes to watch basketball stars in action. When the Raptors were playing, he was a season ticket holder, going to SkyDome to watch the athleticism, power and strength of today's professional athletes.

Watching from the stands like 15,000 other fans was not quite what he had in mind a few years back when he was part of the Ballard/Cohl bid for a Toronto NBA franchise. And it's not quite like representing your country in the Olympic Games, which he did as player/coach back in 1964 in Tokyo. But it's hoops after all and that can't be so bad.

Richman, who also excelled in baseball, track and field and hockey, was honored recently by the Bloor JCC's Basketball Reunion Group for a lifetime of achievements in sports and for his contributions to the community. About 150 people gathered recently at the Bloor JCC, one of Richman's old haunts, to pay tribute to the onetime star player. Richman joins a select group of athletes, including Harry "Sharpy" Litvack, Stan Krivy and Alex Fisher, to be so honored. Those doing the honoring are a group of former athletes who played basketball out of the Bloor "Y" 30 years ago and who now host tribute dinners every three or four years to raise money for the city's junior Maccabi team.

Litvack, who's known Richman for decades, said the honoree "was one of the top Jewish players of his day. He was a good ball handler and and excellent shooter. He was also very competitive and for a little guy (five foot nine) with the desire he had, he really showed well in basketball."

"He was very dedicated and had a lot of talent too," said Archie

Ruby Richman

Richman, Ruby's brother. Not only was he known as "Mr. Basketball" in the 1960s and '70s, but in the early '50s he was offered a Major League tryout with the Brooklyn Dodgers, Archie recalled. It was an offer he turned down to continue his education.

Richman's basketball career started relatively late. Back in the days before TV and saturation media coverage of American leagues, he never even heard of the sport until he was around 10. Growing up in the College and Shaw area, his first exposure to it came from a friend who demonstrated the sport by dribbling a tennis ball and throwing it up against a lamppost.

He learned the game's fundamentals a few years later while attending Camp Northland and in high school, basketball became one of his favorite sports along with track and field, football, baseball and softball.

In his last year at Vaughan Road Academy, Richman, playing guard, helped his team to the city's junior championship.

At the University of Toronto, he was on the 1958 national championship team. He played for the Blues for seven years and later in his college career, he also coached various senior teams around town. All the while, he honed his coaching skills by attended numerous coaching clinics in the Niagara Falls area. In 1963 and '64, he coached the Toronto Dow Kings, which were sponsored by a beer company, to the Canadian Senior Championship.

That got him noticed by the machers on the national level, who appointed him head coach of the 1964 Olympic team. In Japan the team won a pre-Olympic qualifying tournament, advancing to the medal round by beating Australia, Mexico, Cuba, Hungary and Indonesia and a host of other Asian entries.

Canada found itself in a tough draw in the Games themselves, finishing 10th out of 16. Still, Richman said, it was quite an accomplishment considering Canada had not even qualified for the 1960 Olympics and did not qualify again until 1976, when it did so as host country.

Richman considers the Olympics one of the highlights of his athletic career. A personal highlight took place during a match against Hungary. With the game tied and only two seconds left, Canada inbounded the ball to Richman at centre court. He fired a hail-Mary shot that surprised everybody when it found net. The two points gave Canada the win.

By 1976, Richman had moved to the executive suite, serving as president of Basketball Canada. He played a key role in organizing the basketball competition for the Montreal Olympics.

He later accepted a position as vice-president of marketing for Basketball Canada and he also served as president of the Sport Federations of Canada (1978-81), president of Sports Ontario and president of Ontario Basketball.

Richman played on Canada's 1961 Maccabiah Games team and was a player-coach at the 1965, '69, '73 and '77 Maccabiahs. During that span, Canada won only bronze medals, finishing behind perennial powerhouses, Israel and the United States.

When Richman's playing days were over – at least at the highest levels – his hoops career continued as a promoter. In the early '70s, well before the NBA was North American's glamour league, he brought the Los Angeles Lakers and Kansas City Kings to Toronto for an exhibition. The Lakers featured Wilt Chamberlain, Elgin Baylor and Jerry West and were one of the best teams of all time, he said. The game drew 13,000 spectators and led to more NBA exhibitions as well as a series of league games by the ABA.

Right around that time, he and the late Harold Ballard twice attempted to bring an NBA franchise to Toronto. First, they purchased the Buffalo Braves but the team backed out of the deal. Then they looked south, way south, looking to purchase the Houston Rockets and install them in Toronto. They thought they had a done deal until they ran up against some Texas hardball. They received a threatening lawyer's letter saying they faced prosecution for removing the Rockets while they still had contractual ties to the state.

That ended that. Richman's next best chance to get involved with the NBA came a few years ago when the Ballard/Cohl group bid for an expansion club. Richman played a key role in raising a big chunk of the $125 million (US) expansion fee and he, along with Magic Johnson, were the group's basketball-savvy contingent.

"We felt we had as good a chance as anybody," Richman said. But, he believes, his partners didn't go far enough in promising the NBA the moon. It didn't help that they didn't have a profile figurehead like former Ontario premier David Peterson, who was part of the Bitove bid, he said.

"Everybody had the money," he said. "You had to show you were really interested in basketball," not simply in running an effective business.

Though he never became an NBA owner, Richman's contribution to basketball has nevertheless landed him in the Canadian Basketball Hall of Fame. He holds the unique distinction of being inducted in all three categories – as player, coach and builder.

מאת: יעל זליגר

מה אתם יודעים, איזה צרות יש לילדים...

תרופה מרה, חור בשן, שריטה ולעבור פתאום דיכה חן צרות ממש. שלא לדבר על חלום מפחיד, לחישאר ברחוב לבד, עונשים ועקצות ודודות שמנשקות. כך כותבת נירה הראל (תעשי מה שאני אומרת, חוצאת עם עובד) בשמם של כל הילקים. ריב גדול עם החורים, צלחת של מרק בלי סעם, סערה, ברק ורעם זה פשוט איום וכל יום יש צרות; צרות יום יום.

למשל הילד יונתן. הוא פשוט מתקשה לזכור איזה יום היום. לא יודע; אולי רביעי, חמישי, אולי יום אחר. וגמאם לו לשאול או לנחש. מצדו, שיהיה יום ראשון או שני, מה אכפת לו. הוא יודע רק זאת: "לי קוראים יונתן, זה קבוע/ש לי שם אחד בלבד/ שבעה ימים בשבוע/ אפילו בשבת."

חלק מהצרות, שיש לילדים חן פשוט התלבטויות רציניות. למשל יעל הקטנה שעומדת כל היום מול חראי, מודדת בגדים, מסתכלת, בוררת ולא מצליחה לבחור. וכי"ל גם הילד שאבן אוהב לקבל מתנות, אך לו היה נאלץ לבחור לעצמו מתנה, "כשהייתי מגיע לחנות האחרונה/ כבר חיתה נגמרת שנה."

נדמה שחילד אצל אטלס במאבק מתמיד ביצר הרע. הוא תמיד מספר סודות של אחרים, במיוחד כשאמר לו שאסור לגלות לאף אחד. בביקורו אצל סבתא בבית-חולים, בחדר החמתנה "מתחשק לי לפתוח ת'בובנוירה/ שהבאנו לה מתנה." וסתם הוא מבקש "לצאת למרפסת באמצע הלילה/ ולצרוח כמו משוגע." העולם העכשווי נראה לו רדוד בקסמו; "יפעם היה מלך/ עם שרביט וכתר/והיום יש סתם ראש ממשלה." כדרכו, מביע חילד של אטלס טרוניות כלפי דור החורים. "כשאני מספר לאמא/ שהוא כעס עלי/או חרביק/ תמיד היא אומרת: על אבא לא אומרים יהוא." הוא קובל על חשינוי שחל ביחסם של החורים; "כשידעתי לספור/ך אחד שתים/ אבא ואמא/ מחאו כפים./ וכשחצלחתי בסוף/ לספור עד שמונים/ ספרתם על זה/ לכל השכנים./ אז למה היום/ כשאני רוצה שתקשיבו אין אני סופר עד מליון/ כולכם אומרים לי/ אולי תפסיק/ לבלבל ת'מוח!"

חחיים בבית-ספר אינם פשוטים. "כשאני בא לכתה/ עם עשורי-בית וכל חמחברות/ כמה שאני מצביע/ לא יתנו לי לקרוא./ אבל לפעמים/ כשאני לא מכין/ דוקא אז חמורה אומרת/ אתה תפתח ותקרא!"

חן אצל נירה הראל וחן אצל יהודה אטלס לדמות חילד מענקת חבנה פסיכולוגית לחושות חמבוגרים. וכך מעיד חילד של אטלס; "כשהוא נותן לי מכה/ אני נשבע מיד/ שעל חילדים שלי/ אני לא ארים יד./ אבל אולי גם הוא/ לפני שהיה אבא/ חשב אותו חדבר/ כשקבל מכות מסבא." מה שלא יהיה, מבטיחה חילדה, "גם כשאחיה גדולה/ אף פעם לא אשכח/ איזה צרות יש לקטנים/ צרות גדולות כל כך."

About families

Dear Susan,

My best friend's son has just been diagnosed with an incurable disease. His bones will curve and break as a result of progressive multiple surgeries. He will eventually be confined to a wheelchair due to his body's inability to mend itself. Mentally, the boy will remain intact. What can I do or say to support my friend through this personal crisis?

Dear Reader,

Initially the news of her son's illness will come as a shock, as it did to you. She may want to deny its existence, but eventually she will have to move through a grieving process and ultimately accept his fate. As parents, we have hopes and dreams for our children, and your friend will have to face the painful reality that some of these dreams will never come to fruition.

Having a chronically ill child can place a tremendous burden on a marriage and on the interrelationships between all members of a family. Parents may inappropriately direct the guilt and anger that will inevitably result from this situation, and siblings may feel overlooked due to their parents' focus on their ill child. It will take a great deal of strength, love and support for the family to deal with this situation.

As a friend you should do your best to determine how you can be of help. Does your friend need a shoulder to cry on or does she need to withdraw for a time? The initial reaction to such news is often a period of paralysis, and you may be able to help and show your support by asking about his illness and getting as much information as you can about it.

Parents of ill children will frequently be physically and emotionally drained, and will sorely need a respite. Offer to take care of her other children so she can be free to take time out in between doctors' appointments.

Your friend needs to find hope in the midst of this tragedy. You mentioned that the child's mental capacities will not be compromised in any way. Remind your friend that many individuals have successfully overcome physical adversity and have gone on to become successful in their fields.

WHEN AND WHERE do BBYO CHAPTERS meet?

BBYO activities take place at our office as well as in local communal facilities, such as synagogues and or Community Centres. Chapters also hold many of their programs and meetings in individual homes.

HOW DOES YOUR CHILD get INVOLVED in BBYO?

Individual teens are encouraged to join established AZA or BBG chapters. Groups of friends can, however, form their own chapters. A chapter is composed of an elected youth executive, an adult advisor, and individual members.

WHAT is BBYO?

BBYO is the largest Jewish Youth organization in the world, encompassing over 40,000 members in 1,500 chapters.

It is divided into two groups: AZA (Aleph Zadik Aleph) for boys and BBG (B'nai B'rith Girls) for girls in grades nine to O.A.C.; and Teen Connection, for boys and girls in grade eight.

BBYO is an international organization with chapters in Canada, the United States, Israel, England, France, Hungary, Bulgaria, Poland, Ukraine, Sweden, and Germany.

But WHY SHOULD MY TEEN(S) JOIN BBYO?

- FIRST, BBYO offers young people leadership, that is, the opportunity to create and run their own programs. BBYO is a youth-led organization, something that almost no other organization can claim.
- SECOND, BBYO expands your teen's social and creative activities, allowing him or her to do things that would not be possible outside of an organized group setting.
- THIRD, BBYO provides your teen with the opportunity to explore his or her Jewish heritage. BBYO reaches affiliated and non-affiliated youth, offering them diversity in Judaic programs.
- FOURTH, through BBYO your teen is part of an exciting network of Jewish youth. BBYO offers young people the chance to interact with Jewish teens from around the world.
- FIFTH, BBYO offers your teen the opportunity to become a leader. BBYO members can become chapter officers, council officials, or even international leaders. Even the youngest members begin by planning small programs and work their way up to running major events.

WHAT do we do in BBYO?

BBYO is just about everything you can imagine. We have social, recreational, athletic, Judaic and cultural events.

HERE'S A SAMPLING:

- RECREATIONAL
  Dances, overnight events, fashion shows, and inter-city events with other chapters.
- COMMUNITY SERVICE
  Volunteering for community agencies and local causes, environmental projects, and fundraising for charities.
- ATHLETICS
  An AZA floor hockey league.
  Basketball tournaments, trips to see professional sports teams, and Maccabiah competitions.
- CULTURAL
  Films, dramatics, video and theatre are all part of BBYO's activities.
- JUDAIC
  Celebration of holidays, participation in community-wide events, and educational programs in such areas as the Holocaust and Israel.

WHO RUNS ALL OF THIS?

BBYO is coordinated by professional staff composed primarily of men and women with university education and a background in Jewish studies. BBYO chapters have adult volunteers who guide, challenge and supervise all chapter activities.

Caution, relief greet vote

SYNAGOGUE HONORS PM

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien accepts an award from Mendel Green of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto. MONTREAL — The reaction of the Jewish community following the Quebec election ranged from caution to relief to an optimism bordering on giddy.

That the election of a Parti Québécois (PQ) government with a comfortable majority could be met with such equanimity among Jews would have been unthinkable only a few years ago.

The fact that the PQ trailed the Liberals in the popular vote by one percent and the fact that Premier Lucien Bouchard has indicated he has no immediate plans for a referendum have been greeted as an unexpected gift, after weeks of polling pointed to unstoppable PQ popularity that would create the momentum for another referendum.

"It's a very positive development. It's as good news as we could get, short of a Liberal win," said B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) regional director Robert Libman. "We've dodged quite a hefty bullet, and we're unlikely to see a referendum for many, many years. Certainly, it will be next to impossible in the next four years."

Had the PQ done better than 42.7 percent, Libman thinks, many more young Jews would leave Quebec because "they couldn't take the fatigue anymore. Now, there is genuine hope."

Libman, 38, a former Equality party MNA, said, in a way, the result is better than a Liberal victory. Any party in its second mandate is "on the wane," and Libman believes that since the PQ has so many unpopular dossiers to deal with and a reinvigorated opposition to face, it will not be able to muster the popularity needed for a referendum. And no party has been elected for a third term since the Duplessis era.

"However, if the Liberals were in power, and failed to negotiate a satisfactory deal with the federal government, the PQ would have a chance to regain its fire and come back strong."

FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick put it succinctly: "It could have been better, but it could have been a helluva lot worse."

He's pleased with the result, "because it takes off the pressure of any immediacy of a referendum,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Agunah Get Day II

MONTREAL — Several rabbinic organizations, including the Vaad Ha'ir Beth Din of Montreal and Agudas Harabonim of Canada and the United States, are supporting Agunah Get Day II. Slated for Dec. 10, the North America-wide campaign is intended to press recalcitrant husbands to give their wives a get, or Jewish divorce, before Chanukah. For more information, call 718-338-0833.

Rabbi Leaving

CALGARY — Members of Temple B'nai Tikvah are adjusting to news that Rabbi Jordan Goldson will be leaving. The rabbi and his family will be making aliyah next August.

ISRAEL

Activist Arrested

JERUSALEM — Palestinian security forces arrested a senior Islamic Jihad activist suspected of recruiting two terrorists who carried out a bombing in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market several weeks ago. The two bombers were killed and 21 Israelis were wounded in the Nov. 6 attack. According to Israeli security sources, the Palestinian Authority has also detained two more fugitives whose arrest Israel had demanded.

Haredim Protest

BEERSHEVA — Some 500 haredi Israelis protested outside a building here in the wake of reports that it was a centre for missionary activities and baptisms of Jewish children. Israeli police appealed to rabbis to help restore order so that members of the Jews for Jesus movement could leave the building.

WORLD

Clinton Names Bronfman

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Bill Clinton last week appointed Canadian-born Edgar Bronfman to head the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States. The appointment came during a four-day conference on Holocaust assets, namely, insurance policies and artworks, to which Canada sent seven delegates. Bronfman is president of the World Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization.

Car Makers Profited

WASHINGTON — General Motors may have collaborated with the Nazis, according to the Washington Post. A class-action suit has already been filed against Ford on similar charges. Both auto companies say they had no control over their German subsidiaries during World War II. But according to the article, documents indicate that the automakers profited from the Nazis' use of slave labor during the war.

PA 'Misused' Funds

LONDON — The Palestinian Authority (PA) allegedly misused $20 million in aid from Britain and other European countries, according to the London Sunday Times. The aid, supposed to help poor Palestinians, was reportedly used to build luxury apartments for high-level "acolytes" of PA president Yasser Arafat, the paper reported.

Support For Anti-Semite

MOSCOW — Some 500 people rallied in Moscow to support a Communist lawmaker who recently made several anti-Semitic statements. The rally came after a nationwide public opinion poll suggested that most Russians do not support Albert Makashov.

Church to Repent

ROME — Pope John Paul II issued an edict declaring the year 2000 a Holy Year during which individual Catholics and the Roman Catholic Church should ask forgiveness for their past failings. During the Holy Year celebrations, the church is expected to ask forgiveness for specific past errors, including the Inquisition and its inaction during the Holocaust.

Restitution Planned

PRAGUE — The Czech government has established a committee to help return Jewish property confiscated during World War II. The commission will include members of the government and Czech Jewish leaders. Some 20 percent of property confiscated from Czech Jews reportedly remains in the federal government's hands.

Heirs Sue Museum

PARIS — The heirs of a Jewish art collector whose claims for a Nazi-looted painting were rejected have sued the Georges Pompidou Centre for receiving stolen property. The suit is the first of its kind in France, where the National Museum Authority is said to possess nearly 2,000 pieces of art plundered by the Nazis during World War II.

Accused Nazi Dies

PHILADELPHIA — A man who was linked to the slaughter of Jews in Lithuania during World War II died last week in a Pennsylvania nursing home before he could be deported. In April, a U.S. immigration judge had ordered that Jonas Stelmokas be deported to his native Lithuania for lying about his activities as a member of a Nazi-sponsored auxiliary police unit during the war. Stelmokas, 82, was appealing the order at the time of his death.

Soccer Game Venue for Anti-Semitic Slogans

ROME — The president of Rome's Jewish community says local Jews must react to an outburst of anti-Semitic slogans at a soccer game here last weekend.

Sandro Di Castro made the comments after a match between arch-rival teams Roma and Lazio, during which fans displayed banners deriding the other team's fans with anti-Semitic slogans.

"Auschwitz Is Your Homeland, the Ovens Are Your Homes," read a banner unfurled in the stands by Lazio fans.

Roma fans in turn displayed an anti-Semitic sign that used Nazi and Holocaust imagery.

"We've been fighting against this for years, but we don't get anywhere. It's high time to put an end to it," said Vittorio Pavoncello, the Rome Jewish community board member in charge of sports activities.

During the past decade, soccer fans in several European countries have occasionally used racist and anti-Semitic slogans to disparage their opponents.

Italy's Jews have protested formally to soccer officials in the past.

Quebec Jews resigned to four more years of uncertainty

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish community voters the day after the election took some solace in the fact that the Liberals had edged out the Parti Québécois (PQ) in popular support.

But despite the so-called "moral victory," a random sampling of Jewish voters also appeared to be resigned to at least four more years of uncertainty and the threat of separation, as a result of the PQ's return to power.

And there was no consensus among those questioned, given the closeness of the popular vote, over whether there would in fact be another referendum.

Julius Strolovitch seemed to articulate the feelings of many Jews in saying that he thought that Premier Lucien Bouchard would delay a referendum, but still hold one.

The Jewish community, he said, probably feels a bit less insecure due to the Liberals' lead in the popular vote.

But the overall election results, he also said, were quite disappointing, even if not particularly surprising. "We did accomplish something by the fact that the [popular] vote was not in their favor."

Damper put on Bouchard's plans

The results, he felt, put a damper on plans Bouchard might have had to stage a referendum soon. To win one, Strolovitch said, "they have a long way to go."

Still, he was pretty certain there would be a referendum, even if it takes place in three or four years. The PQ, he said, "is never gonna give up."

Less certain about a referendum was 25-year-old Esther Ohayon.

She felt that Bouchard really doesn't want one, but has been pressured by PQ militants into pledging to hold one.

The Liberal edge on the popular vote, she felt, will allow Bouchard to step away from holding a referendum he didn't really want anyway, and free him to deal with issues Quebecers care more about, like health care and the economy.

As leader of a sovereigntist party, she said, Bouchard, "has to speak about sovereignty," but that doesn't mean he really wants it.

He is "responsible," Ohayon said, and is more concerned with protecting the "interests of Quebec and perhaps his own power than secession."

Helping society evolve

Over the next few weeks, this space will contain reflections on my visit to Israel last month to attend the 67th General Assembly of the UJA Federations of North America.

Because Israel is so constantly in the news and because we are so constantly tuned in to that news, we tend to forget that it is a young country.

It is a society in transition, trying to emerge from the singular existential challenge of sheer physical survival that has preoccupied its first 50 years of life, to the rather more complex challenge of fashioning a way of life and nurturing a society based upon uniquely-Israeli, core, bedrock values of goodness and decency.

In Israel, typically, the challenge is complicated more than usual, for after 50 years it is still integrating large numbers of newcomers from vastly differing parts of the world, still reconciling politically opposite backgrounds among its people into a western-style democracy, still trying to find a balance between the rights of individuals and the rights of the state.

On Nov. 17, I attended a press conference that was a paradigm of that challenge. On the dais were Pinchas Zeltzer and Menachem Sheizaf of Israel, Dr. Ron Weiser of Australia and Irwin Cotler of Canada.

The press conference was ostensibly called to give "a status report on the critical issues surrounding the Maccabiah bridge disaster" of July 1997.

Three "critical issues" were identified: avoiding a recurrence of such disasters, the matter of compensation for the injured, and the fate of the two heads of the Maccabi World Union.

Readers of The CJN will recall that on July 14, 1997, during the opening ceremony of the 15th Maccabi Games in Israel, a pedestrian bridge over the Yarkon River collapsed. At the time of the collapse, more than 100 athletes were on the bridge. Most were from the Australian delegation.

Four Australian athletes were killed in the disaster; 64 were injured.

Some of the athletes were hurt by the fall, many others by the pollution in the river.

The bridge collapse evoked outrage. Investigations and inquiries were held into its circumstances.

Two sets of legal proceedings eventually ensued. Some of the victims and their families are seeking damages for their injuries in civil court. And the state launched criminal proceedings against five individuals:

- Yoram Eyal, chair of the 15th Maccabiah Organizing Committee,
- Micha Bar-Ilan, the engineer who planned the bridge,
- Adam Mishori, head of the Irgunit company hired by the Organizing Committee to build the bridge,
- Yehoshua Ezra and Baruch Karagula, the contractors hired by Irgunit.

In addition to these proceedings, one year after the collapse on July 29, the Knesset created a special committee to study the lessons of the disaster.

Of the three issues identified by the press conference participants, one issue was more critical than the others.

The Australian Jewish community wants the two leaders of the Maccabi World Union who were responsible for organizing the games "to assume moral responsibility" and step aside from their offices, at least for the duration of the legal and parliamentary proceedings."

The reason the Australian community has not wavered these past 16 months from pressing this key demand relates to the plight of one of their athletes hurt in the disaster. Her situation embodies the pain the community continues to suffer.

When she plunged into the Yarkon and ingested its poisons, Sasha Elterman, at the time a 15-year-old tennis player from Sidney, became infected by a terrible, debilitating fungus.

As of Nov. 17, some 16 months after she was hurt, Sasha had undergone 30 surgical procedures. She requires round-the-clock medical treatment. In the seven weeks prior to the press conference, she had been unable to get out of bed.

Sheizaf, a public activist, explained why he took part in the press conference. In typical Israeli fashion, he put the issue squarely and simply: "We want to elevate social standards in Israel closer to those of the west. Accountability must not only be legal but moral as well."

To the challenge as defined by Sheizaf, Irwin Cotler lent the considerable moral weight of his reputation. "If we take seriously the question of good government [and accountability], the chairman and the president should step aside until the outcome of the [Knesset] inquiry."

Cotler offered four reasons for his view: "It would ease the pain of the people in Australia; the absence of the resignations would send a signal of insensitivity to the Australians; it would redress somewhat the rupture in relations; and it was, simply, the right thing to do."

Weiser, president of the Australian Zionist Federation, emphasized several times that the issue was not one of support for Israel. The Jews of Australia "are very strong supporters of Israel," he said.

One of the remarkable aspects of the news conference was that it brought together Jews from three far-apart continents who were tied in the common cause of trying to help steer the evolution of Israeli society into the very best it can be.

Chief Rabbi offers prescription to avoid assimilation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews must take serious steps to stem the tide of assimilation and intermarriage, asserts Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Israel Meir Lau.

Rabbi Lau was speaking at Ohr Somayach's Gala Event, a dinner and reception held last week at the Sheraton Centre. Program honoree was businessman, philanthropist and Ohr Somayach Jerusalem student Stephen Rosen.

The rabbi spoke of meeting an old man, Baruch Hakatsav, in Moscow in 1989, who desperately tried to spend every minute he could with him. When encouraged to make aliyah, the man cried that if he did, there wouldn't be anyone to teach his grandchildren about being Jewish.

"I see in every Russian child the grandchildren of Baruch Hakatsav," Rabbi Lau said. "I meet them in Jerusalem."

Through prayer and the study and observance of Torah we can stem the "flood of assimilation" and ensure the spiritual survival of our children, especially after the physical destruction of six million Jews during the Holocaust, said Rabbi Lau, himself a child survivor.

The rabbi quoted chilling statistics from a recent survey by the World Jewish Congress. "The study says that in the Diaspora, there are now 8.6 million identified Jews. According to the survey, because of mixed marriages and the low Jewish birth rate, in 25 years there will be 4.4 million – half the number of today."

Everyone must do their part, he said, not just rabbis and presidents of communities. "If Torah is not forgotten, we will be immortal," he said. "Then we will really be able to say Am Yisrael Chai."

Rabbi Baruch Taub praised Rosen for his "passion for learning, living, and sharing Torah."

He warned against "the welcoming embrace of our neighbors." The seeming friendship can be so "seductive", Rabbi Taub said, that people can be encouraged to leave Yiddishkeit.

Rosen, through his work with Ohr Somayach, is helping counterbalance this appeal, the rabbi said.

For six years, Rosen has spent six weeks in the summer studying at Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem. Several speakers, including his son, Matthew, praised him not only for his own progress in Torah study, but for being a mentor to the other, often younger, students.

Presentations were made to Chaya Milevsky, in honor of her late husband, Rabbi Uziel Milevsky, former chief rabbi of Mexico, and founding dean and well-respected teacher at Ohr Somayach Thornhill; and to Howard Sitzer, who received the Torah Achievement Award. Sitzer takes daily classes at Ohr Somayach's Toronto branch on Spadina.

A speech by Ohr Somayach founding dean Rabbi Nota Schiller, as well as a moving video, told the story of the institution's work in Odessa.

Before the dinner, Rosen downplayed the importance of his being honored, saying he was "embarrassed by all the attention." Rather, he said, he wanted to focus on the work of Ohr Somayach.

"A year and a half or two years ago," he said, Ohr Somayach was a "dispirited organization. Since then, it has been revitalized, and you wouldn't believe all the learning and davening that goes on there."

The dinner is "the symbol of our coming together," in warmth and enthusiasm.

Master of ceremonies was former federal cabinet minister Robert Kaplan. Speakers included Arye Lebovic, who praised Rabbi Milevsky for being able to "integrate Torah into 20th century life," John Kaplan, and Bob Benia, producer of Toronto's Israel at 50 program.

While in Toronto, Rabbi Lau visited the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, where he examined a photograph of himself as a child arriving in Israel after World War II. [Ron Csillag photo]

Parents launch new funding fight

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Wayne Levin

TORONTO — In politics, they say, the squeaky wheel gets the grease. But as far as Wayne Levin is concerned, the Jewish community has not been loud enough in pressing its demands for its share of provincial funds to help lubricate the wheels of the Jewish day school system.

It's time to make some noise, says Levin, a 38-year-old father of three, who's already faced with annual tuition fees of $7,500 for just the eldest of his brood.

With prospective tuition fees of $20,000 and more staring him in the face, Levin has decided to take the bull by the horns and mobilize a grassroots movement of parents to lobby for government funding for Jewish and other independent day schools.

Levin is a key figure behind Parents for Educational Choice (PEC), a small group of parents who are developing a variety of tactics to publicize what they see as unfairness in the current funding scheme, and to press the government to include independent religious schools in their funding formulas.

Beyond the issue of dollars and cents, it's a question of fundamental fairness, Levin asserts. "We want equal treatment from government," he says.

Levin bristles at the idea that Roman Catholic schools receive full taxpayer support, while Jewish and Protestant schools do not. Furthermore, there are other educational institutions that benefit from government support, including French immersion schools, two Ukrainian schools that come under the Catholic system, a "triangle program" for gay children, and other public schools that limit their enrolment.

Jewish schools are just as deserving of government funding as these other institutions, Levin argues.

The creation of a new grassroots parents group has been welcomed by Canadian Jewish Congress, which has been pushing for day school funding for years. Ontario governments of all stripes have turned down its appeals that it fund Jewish days schools.

While there are no formal links between Congress and PEC, both share the view that the time is ripe to make political strides.

"We are under the impression that the government, and Premier [Mike] Harris in particular, is ready to be convinced," Levin said. The Ontario government has undertaken massive changes to the education system, and changes to the funding scheme for independent schools would be "a drop in the bucket," he said.

Pointing to the government's underlying philosophy of equal funds for all students, said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, "If ever we had a chance for government funding, it's with this government.

"This issue is the top issue on the Congress agenda," he added.

Congress has invited the leaders of all three political parties to address meetings of its regional executive. Premier Harris is scheduled to address the meeting in January and he can expect to be peppered with questions on the issue, Landy predicted.

Levin and Landy believe that with enough political pressure, the government will move on school funding. Congress is planning to commission a poll to survey public opinion in Ontario, to provide skeptical government officials with data showing Ontarians support funding for independent shools, Landy said.

PEC, meanwhile, is circulating a legislative petition in various Toronto-area shuls calling for fair treatment for Jewish and other schools. More than 1,000 signatures were gathered in three weeks. Similar petitions are planned for Ottawa and Hamilton. PEC hopes to present the petition to the legislature and have it read into the parliamentary record. PEC has also designed a 10-foot by 12-foot poster letter addressed to Harris, urging him to take action on the issue, Levin added.

PEC has also met with several backbench MPPs to solicit their support while another aspect of their campaign is to educate the Jewish community. "They think that it's gone to the Supreme Court and that's the end of it. That's not true," Levin said.

PEC has also set up an Internet Web site [www.total.net/~levin] with more information on the issue. The organization's e-mail address is: [equaled@total.net].

Chess champ asks support for Israel academy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There's a glint in Garry Kasparov's piercing eyes when he's asked about his official title. He's the best chess player on Earth – the highest ranked in history.

But he's not the recognized champion of FIDE, the game's global governing body. That title belongs to the man Kasparov defeated for the world crown in 1985, Anatoly Karpov.

Kasparov, who oozes self-confidence, doesn't much care for titles.

"As long as I'm unbeatable, I don't care what [FIDE] is doing. My title is self-supporting by definition. I'm the best player. That's the best title."

For chess buffs, the 35-year-old genius is indeed world champ, and probably the best player ever to slam down a rook.

He was in Toronto last week to drum up support for the Kasparov International Chess Academy in Tel Aviv, which he established in 1994 to teach the game, conduct tournaments and indulge his latest passion – integrating chess into school curricula, not only in Israel but in Europe and North America.

His visit was organized by the Tel Aviv Foundation, under whose auspices the academy operates. Accompanying Kasparov was Roni Milo, the former mayor of Tel Aviv who recently announced he will run for prime minister of Israel in the next election.

Kasparov told a select gathering that Israel now boasts 32 chess grandmasters, compared to 60 in Russia, which has dominated the game for decades.

Chess boosts math and logic skills and teaches self-confidence, especially to the many low-income kids at the academy, he said.

"In chess, you learn very quickly that you pay the price for every move. You learn that you are on your own, and that if you make a bad move, there's no one to blame but yourself."

In a CJN interview, Kasparov conceded that had he peaked only a few years earlier, his Jewish background could have prevented him from becoming world champ.

Born Garryk Weinstein in Baku, his Jewish father died when Kasparov was seven. Already a world junior champ, he challenged for the world adult title just as glasnost and perestroika were taking hold in the Soviet Union.

"If it had been even one year earlier, I could have lost my coaching, lost my funding, or they could have forced me to emigrate. Here I was, Armenian and Jewish. [To Soviet officials], neither was good."

Instead, at age 22, Kasparov became the youngest world champion in history. Since his defeat of his countryman Karpov, he has beaten the best, and in the absence of any strong challengers, has taken to crushing entire teams in simultaneous games.

He's also a proponent of speed chess, in which players usually have less than 30 minutes to complete a game.

The champ demonstrated his prowess by quickly but graciously dispatching two young players: Roman Golts, 16, a Canadian master, and his 11-year-old sister, Diana, a top-ranked player in her age group. The siblings are Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet republic of Moldova.

Players at this level are used to thinking for excruciatingly long periods of time, but Kasparov doesn't pause for a second when asked about his stunning loss last year to IBM's Deep Blue supercomputer – the upset that shocked the world.

"It was a fraud," he snaps. "They refused to show how the machine made its moves. They refused to show print-outs, and they dismantled it right after the match. I was happy to be part of it, but from my point of view, the match was not kosher."

Kasparov beat the first version of Deep Blue in 1996. But last May, an improved, second generation computer beat the champ in six games, throwing him and many others who believe in the supremacy of the human brain into a deep funk.

He said he would agree to a rematch with the machine only under strict conditions. In the meantime, he's busy advancing chess through the Internet and strengthening the game in Israel, which he said has the potential to produce the next crop of world champions.

Anyone wishing to donate to the Kasparov International Chess Academy may contact the Tel Aviv Foundation, c/o 55 St. Claire Ave. W., Suite 410, Toronto, M4V 2Y7 or call 416-920-3252.

Respite, not victory

People expected the beginning piece to fall quickly into Premier Lucien Bouchard's "winning conditions" puzzle immediately after the provincial election last week in Quebec. The experts had predicted a substantial victory for the separatists and with it, an emotional and psychological springboard to the next referendum. But there was no substantial victory for the separatists. That first piece failed to materialize. The puzzle remains, for the time being at least, merely an outline.

The Parti Québécois (PQ) did indeed win the election, returning 75 deputies to the National Assembly. But the Liberals won the contest for the popular vote by a slight margin of one percent. More people actually voted for the Liberals (43.7 percent) than for the PQ (42.7 percent). Despite the idiosyncratic result, however, most federalists seemed to be satisfied with the outcome of the election because they understood the implications of the 42.7 percent figure: the majority of Quebecers do not want a referendum.

Bouchard understood the implications of the vote as well, acknowledging even on election night and then over the course of the next few days that there appeared to be in Quebec no appetite for another referendum.

The question occupying most federalists therefore is whether the premier will focus his energies on managing the affairs of the province for the benefit of all Quebecers, or whether he will endeavor to create an appetite for another referendum.That appetite might develop if a majority of Quebecers believed, or were led to believe, there was no real possibility of linguistic, cultural or societal fulfilment within the Canadian federation.

Trying to prove precisely that case may be one of the PQ's key objectives over the next four or five years. Being confrontational, trying to goad the rest of Canada into "throwing up its hands" in frustration, some people speculate, may be the PQ's tactics. The upcoming provincial-federal discussions on renewed social union will provide us ample evidence of Bouchard's intentions.

Thus while there may have been reason for federalists to celebrate at the results of the Quebec election last week, it bears remembering it was only a respite, not a victory.

Images of horror

The photo on the front page of this newspaper, of rampaging Palestinians hurling stones at two Israelis in a car, was like a pounding hammer galvanizing images of horror onto the already suspicious psyche of Israelis. An Israeli driver and his hitchhiking soldier passenger had apparently gotten lost last Wednesday near Ramallah and found themselves near a gang of protesting Palestinians demanding the release of hundreds of prisoners being held in Israeli jails. The two were mercilessly attacked.

The angry mob began pelting the car with stones and smashing its windows. The driver ran away after a large rock struck him in the face. The soldier was dragged from the car and beaten. But he too was able to escape, though bleeding from the head.

In the aftermath of the attack, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu suspended the next phase of the Wye accords deployments due to take place in two weeks. He accused the Palestinian Authority (PA) of encouraging such acts of violence and was justified in trying to bring the PA to account for the mob's behavior.The images of the frenzied mob acting out their hatred were chilling.

President Bill Clinton is scheduled to be in Israel and in Gaza later this week to address the PA National Council and to oversee the public cancellation by the PA of the articles in the PLO charter calling for Israel's destruction. He comes none too soon.

Time for a name change to help Russian Jews

Your report (CJN, Nov. 19), on the rise of anti-Semitism in Russia is disappointing but not surprising. Historically whenever there is an economic downturn, Jews have always been made the scapegoat.

In 1972, after a visit to the Soviet Union a number of us organized Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for Soviet Jewry with two main objects. One was to lobby the Soviets and the Canadian governments to allow Jews to practise their religion in peace, and the other was to agitate for Jews who wished to emigrate from the Soviet Union, to be permitted to do so without harassment and severe financial penalties. With the dismantling of the Soviet Union and the advent of Perestroika and Glasnost, synagogues re-opened and thousands, upon thousands of Jews were allowed to leave for destinations of their choice.

We were so delighted and optimistic that we changed the name of our organization to Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for World Jewry believing that our focus could be other than the former Soviet Union or Russia. Sadly, with your report that anti-Semitism almost has parliamentary or Duma endorsement, it may be that the name of our organization will have to revert back to what it was during the darkest days of the Cold War.

Wrong to imply that German Jews were forgotten

The headline "German Jews called forgotten victims of Holocaust," which appeared on an article (CJN, Nov. 14) was inappropriate.

Kristallnacht, while signifying the onset of the Holocaust, primarily deals with events that occurred in Germany in November 1938. Equivalent recognition, to a similar extent, has not been accorded to any Holocaust event which occurred in any other European country, yet consider the following statistics: in Germany, 50 percent of its prewar population of 500,000 to 600,000 was murdered. In Holland, 75 percent of its Jewish population was exterminated. In Poland, at least 90 percent or over 3,000,000 Jews were killed. Comparative statistics, varying only in immensity can be given for the prewar Jewish population of other European countries.

The Holocaust, regardless in which country it occurred, is a tragedy of unimaginable proportions touching all of worldwide Jewry.

Arafat must live up to agreements

Is Arafat playing a joke on the world or is he really serious?

In the five years since the signing of the Oslo agreements, the Palestinian Authority has been responsible for the following violations:

More Israelis have been murdered by Palestinian terrorists operating in areas under the control of the authority than in any other similar period. Incitement of hatred of Israel is greater than ever. Refusal to amend the PLO covenant calling for the destruction of Israel. Refusing to dismantle the infrastructure of the terrorist organizations operating in areas under its control. Refusing to turn over known terrorists who have murdered Israelis to the State of Israel. Refusing to reduce its police force to the size agreed to under the agreement.

These are but some of the violations of the Oslo agreement carried out by the Palestinian Authority.

It is time now for the world nations, including Canada, to demand forcibly that the Palestinian Authority fulfil its obligations, and apply the needed pressure on the Palestinian Authority until it does so.

Prevent tragedies in Israel in tribute to Holocaust

The Jewish community of Toronto commemorated Holocaust Education Week, Oct. 29-Nov. 9. In the past three decades, numerous books, memorials and university courses on the Holocaust in diverse countries have come into being by the action of many Jews. I question whether we could not have channeled much of this vast energy into a more productive cause.

Israel is far from an ideal Jewish country. In fact, it is a scandal that the Jewish homeland is no different than other Western countries with their grave social ills. Israel has a high rate of domestic violence, murders, suicides, work accidents, drownings and road fatalities. No greater memorial to the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust would there be than to work for life-affirming and life-enhancing projects to sharply reduce all these preventable Jewish tragedies.

Perspectives

Betrayal

By VERA JEHROS

The Jonas Daniel Meierplein in Amsterdam used to be the centre of Jewish activity before World War II. On one corner stands the Great Synagogue, or the Ashkenazi synagogue. On the other side of the square is the much larger, beautiful Portuguese or Sephardi synagogue.

Erected in the 17th century, the Great Synagogue is the oldest synagogue in western Europe. However, an expanding congregation required a larger building, and in 1686, the Obbene Shul was constructed followed shortly thereafter by a third synagogue, and finally in 1729, the New Synagogue was built.

During the first years of World War II, the five synagogues were able to continue their services, but the last years of the war saw a shrinking attendance accelerated by the deportation of the Jewish people as a result of the German occupation. The systematic plunder of Holland by the Germans drove the freezing and undernourished population to the synagogues and other empty buildings, which they stripped of all combustibles to use for heating and cooking of the scarce food.

In the middle of this synagogue complex, almost hidden and overshadowed by the Great Synagogue, stood a pharmacy of moderate proportions, whose Jewish owner was well known and widely respected. Unlike the drug marts of today, the pharmacy focused only on the preparation of doctors' prescriptions.

I lived not far from there in one of the spacious, renovated old buildings; it was subdivided into four apartments overlooking one of Amsterdam's many tree-lined canals. I not only resided there, I also worked for an elderly Jewish couple as a domestic helper, the only "profession" still permitted for a Jewish girl during the war. We were not allowed to travel, board a streetcar, visit or mix with the non-Jewish population, or enter Amsterdam's beautiful parks. I could not visit my family in the country since it required travel by train.

Slowly we were separated and isolated from the Dutch citizens, and we were caught in a net from which there was no escape.

Since I was young, I don't think I fully understood the mortal danger of our situation and every day I went out in the neighborhood to shop in the Jewish stores, though they did not have much left to sell. I simply had to escape from the sombre atmosphere of our house and the boredom of the domestic chores.

But where I had hope, my elderly employers became more and more depressed. Highly respected in the Jewish community, prominent in the Diamond Exchange, blessed with children and grandchildren, they had been issued an Ausweis (ID card) by the German occupation, which exempted them from deportation to Germany – or so it was thought.

They were God-fearing, yet faith had abandoned them. Perhaps they had a foreboding of approaching doom.

I had no Ausweis because I was not considered important or indispensable. With my yellow star of David attached to the lapel of my coat, I ventured into the streets every day. Since the Germans had imposed a curfew that prevented us from going out at night, I had to be home on time. Each apartment had a "guest room" on the top floor, but they were mostly empty.

One day we heard the German police vans racing through the street, stopping everywhere to ring the bell insistently. As soon as the door was opened, the Germans (or perhaps they were Dutch traitors in uniform) pushed everybody aside and arrested the young people who were living in the house.

When I heard the noise, I managed to run to the room on the top floor, where I locked the door from inside and hid in a large cupboard. Holding my breath, I heard heavy footsteps stamping on the stairs until they reached the top floor, where it was silent. All the rooms were empty and all the doors unlocked. When they reached my room, they tried to open the door, but since there was not a living soul up there, they assumed that this last room was also empty, and they turned around and rushed down the stairs to resume their ghastly activities.

Unable to socialize or do any meaningful work, I used the time to study French, and with the help of some nice Dutch people, I was able to successfully pass the exams for a French diploma. However, there were no other possibilities for advancement and the future looked bleak.

One day when I was aimlessly crossing the Jonas Daniel Meierplein, my eye fell on the pharmacy, standing unobtrusively and almost lost in the shadow of the adjacent Great Synagogue. On impulse I entered the premises. The owner approached me and inquired about the purpose of my visit. He was a middle-aged man, on the short side, stocky, and he had a friendly face. He wore a spotless white coat over his suit. Actually I did not know what I wanted but blurted out: "Can I work here?"

Taken by surprise he adjusted his spectacles slowly, took a second look at me and replied: "Certainly, but you have to study Latin."

"I would love to," I said, "but I have no money."

"No problem" was the reply; "I shall introduce you to our provisor.

Apparently, the owner was no pharmacist himself and therefore he was required by law to engage the services of a provisor, a qualified pharmacist.

"Come back next week. Then he will be here."

I could not believe my ears and could hardly wait for the day to meet the provisor, hoping of course that he would agree to instruct me in Latin, me a boorish, plain country girl.

The days passed by agonizingly slowly, but finally the next week arrived, and I went to the pharmacy with trepidation alternated with hopeful expectations, and at the same time fearful of rejection.

I was met by a small distinguished looking man in his 30s with dark graying hair, intelligent eyes, and a firm chin and cheekbones. I instantly liked him, and apparently he approved of me, because we came to an agreement to meet twice a week for a lesson in Latin. The problem was how and where, since he lived in the fashionable southern district of Amsterdam, and as we were both Jewish, we were not allowed to use the streetcar.

However oppression is the father of improvisation.

I had an uncle still residing in a luxurious apartment nearby, who allowed us the use of a room for our class once a week, and my new teacher was willing to walk about 40 minutes to meet me there. I would walk the same distance from the opposite direction.

And so started a warm and instructive relationship. Either he came walking to me or I went to him, walking being one of the few relaxations left to us by the Germans. For me it was a lifeline, an escape from a drab and joyless life; a shimmering light in the darkness. It was not to last.

One day he studied me for a long moment and said, "We won't see each other again. I am going underground."

I stared at him with incomprehension. People disappeared because the Germans arrested them, but voluntarily? I did not understand what he meant. What he meant was, that he, his brother (a doctor in a Jewish hospital), and six Dutch reserve army officers were going to escape to England and offer their services to the war effort over there.

He said they had been able to secure the services of a Dutch chauffeur sympathetic to their goal, who agreed to drive them to the coast, where a small boat was to pick them up for the crossing of the North Sea.

It was a good plan, it was an excellent plan. It had only one flaw: The chauffeur was a Nazi who brought them straight into the arms of the Gestapo. Eight courageous young men in their prime, Holland's glory. They were shot, all of them.

Betrayed – by one of their own.

Israel's student revolt—'90s style

Not far from the intensive cabinet meetings over the Wye Agreement, or the annual General Assembly of the leadership of the North American Jewish community, Israel's university students were conducting their own grassroots campaign against the system and the establishment. By striking for over four weeks, they succeeded in postponing the opening of the academic year, and in drawing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu into a marathon, six-day and six-night negotiation.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Some hailed the student protest as evidence of a new, hopeful wave of social activism aimed at shifting social priorities. Others saw the situation more cynically, as a blatant bid for publicity by the indefatigable student leader, Erez Eshel. The truth probably lies somewhere in between.

The 29-year-old Eshel, a.k.a. "Red Eshel", is no stranger to activism and protest. Viewed by many as a young, charismatic voice representing the new "centre" in Israeli society and politics, Eshel is one of the aggressive, tenacious leaders of Dor Shalom – itself one of the more interesting phenomena on the Israeli political and social scene in the last few years.

The Dor Shalom (the generation of peace) movement emerged from the thousands of "candle youth" that filled Rabin Square in the weeks following Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. Its leaders were determined to make a social difference, rather than to simply be part of the peace movement.

Three short years later, Dor Shalom is active in disadvantaged neighborhoods across the country, trying to organize after-school programs for children and youth to counteract the influence of the haredi Shas party. In last month's municipal elections, Dor Shalom ran successfully in a number of municipalities. By winning seats in municipal councils, they hope to obtain government funding for their social programs, seeking to change the hold of the existing religious parties on extracurricular programs that attract children from poor families.

Erez Eshel, who put his kippah back on after the Rabin assassination (which he felt targeted observant Israelis unfairly and en masse), has been advocating a "social revolution" for years. He believes that Israeli society has lost its solidarity and sense of mutual responsibility, while unproductive pressure groups have taken advantage of public coffers.

Leading a student revolt to reduce tuition fees, was for him, the only way to galvanize thousands of students into action. The great surprise was the overwhelming response to his call for action, and the degree of public support for the students' demands.

On the political side, the students were eventually outmaneuvered by the prime minister. In the early days of the strike, oblivious to the perseverance of the students, and the degree of public support for their stand, he had branded them "enemies of the state". But by the fourth week, he was prepared to spend six days negotiating with students in the third week of a hunger strike, who literally camped out in the Prime Minister's Office. The emerging agreement seemed to contain the ingredients for a compromise between the students and skeptical Finance Ministry officials. Rather than lowering tuition fees (10,000 shekels annually), the agreement will expand the student loan program and an existing scholarship program that is linked to community service.

These achievements could perhaps have been gained without the drama of roadblocks, arrests and a prolonged hunger strike. Eshel and his colleagues obviously took advantage of the single issue that could unite the students in order to further their own exposure and budding political aspirations. But what was most interesting about the protest, was the chord that it nevertheless struck in so many people.

The students were backed by disparate groups ranging from professors to neighborhood activists from the "periphery." For the former, the attraction was the solidarity and commitment shown by the students to their cause. For the latter, it was the sense that they may find new allies, previously identified with the elite, for their own social battles.

Public opinion responded to the students' claim that they were older than the average university student in other countries, due to the three years of military service they were obliged to do prior to their studies. As a result, the students argued, they should not be forced to work full time in order to finance their studies, especially since many of them started families while still in school.

There may have been something deeper percolating in response to the student protest. Israelis are slowly moving from a preoccupation with security to a concern over quality of life. There are deep divisions over the shape of their society, but there is a sense that the debate is unavoidable and urgent. The students captured this sense of urgency, and reflected a frustration and a search for a "better way." Ironically, the diverse, multicultural nature of the protesters created a unifying theme, to which the public responded.

It was a protest for the times, that was perhaps perceived as being more significant than it really was. But was it a momentary burst of energy, or did it indeed portend a new source of action and enthusiasm?

Quebec, Canada and the Jews

The more things change…The recent Quebec election results will be subject to multiple interpretations, but an early consensus is that the Parti Québécois (PQ) government has been given a mandate to govern, rather than to hold an early referendum and push for independence.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The nearly equal share of the popular vote received by the two leading parties should also teach pollsters, who were predicting a PQ margin of five to 10 points, some needed humility. In fact, survey support for the PQ, and for sovereignty, is usually several points higher than in actual elections or referendums.

The election was clearly not about sovereignty. In fact, it was not about much of anything. Premier Lucien Bouchard speaks of creating "winning conditions." Since the 1980 referendum, there has been almost no talk of sovereignty among the general Quebec population. There has been talk of referendum questions, of negotiating strategies, of demands, of winning conditions, but no discussion of a vision of an independent Quebec.

The question, "why or what type of independence?" is just not asked, unlike in the heady days of the 1960s and 1970s, when Quebec sovereigntists spent late nights debating contrasting visions of an independent Quebec. There has also been no passion for independence, no mobilization of students or intellectuals, anywhere, not during the 1985 referendum debate, and certainly not in this campaign.

Perhaps this reflects the assumption that many Quebecers think sovereignty is inevitable. But when, and in what shape? I think this reflects a confusion; at times deliberately fomented by crafty militants, about what sovereignty could mean. What Quebecers really want to is be treated as equal partners, to renegotiate something, but they have no clear vision of the outcome. This is why large minorities of potential Yes voters still feel that an independent Quebec would share the Canadian dollar and the Canadian passport, and send MPs to Ottawa, and why even the latest polls show significant minorities of PQ voters who do not want another referendum and would vote against it.

But what the people want and what actually happens are two separate things. The work of renewing federalism, and yes, accommodating Quebec, remains unfinished. This accommodation, too, can take many forms, and can well involve accommodation of other provinces and regions, and not necessarily via massive constitutional change.

The election campaign was also happily silent about ethnic and minority issues, and the somewhat rehabilitated Jacques Parizeau limited his inane comments to other subjects. I would guess Jews voted overwhelmingly for the Liberals, possibly more than any other ethnic group in Quebec.

Over the past years, I completed an anthology of great Canadian texts, with historian Desmond Morton at McGill. In the process, I became more convinced than ever that the French fact is an indelible part of the Canadian experience. I also reflected on why Jews are such staunch federalists. Canada has been relatively stable, a "peaceable kingdom" trying to learn from past mistakes. Quebec sovereignty would threaten that stability and offer Jews (and most others) no tangible benefits.

Apart from stability, there is the recent track record regarding anti-Semitism. Despite high levels of wartime anti-Semitism, neither Canada nor the United States visited pogroms or a Holocaust on Jews. In recent memory, no significant political party in North America has endorsed the kind of anti-Semitic rhetoric emerging again in Europe.

While attitude surveys have found somewhat higher levels of anti-Semitism in Quebec, actual reported incidents are not higher than elsewhere in Canada, and organized Holocaust denial and hate groups are based elsewhere. But Quebec society has never confronted the full meaning of its anti-conscription vote in 1942.

So Quebec Jews are never certain whether the ethnocentrism of Jacques Parizeau represented a drunken blip or a real indication of popular sentiment. My own sense is that the increasing pluralism within Quebec, notably in Montreal, is slowly undermining old prejudices.

Swiss funds for the needy

Several months ago the presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress and the United Israel Appeal were notified by the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) in Jerusalem that certain Swiss funds for Canadian Shoah survivors would be made available, and that persons should be designated to plan for and carry out the distribution of these funds.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I accepted the invitation to chair the Canadian effort and have established a nation-wide committee consisting entirely of community-oriented survivors. I have also had the assistance of two staff members from the above-named organizations and have obtained important advice from other sources, including B'nai Brith Canada.

We have been allotted only about $2½ million (US). We have applied for an increase, but have not so far been successful. We estimate that there are some 16,000 to 18,000 survivors living in Canada who will wish to know who is and who is not eligible to obtain some share of the funds.

Our system of allocation resembles that adopted in the United States, and must be approved by the WJRO before we can proceed. There are two main conditions: an applicant must affirm to being a survivor and to being needy. The first condition is defined as someone who has lived under a Nazi regime in Germany or an occupied country, or under a regime that collaborated with the Nazis.

But the second condition is not defined at all. Neediness is something that every applicant must determine personally. The committee cannot and will not judge that decision and will not override the applicant's affirmation, which therefore remains a matter of conscience for each survivor. This means that every applicant will receive the same share.

Applicants must be living; families cannot claim for deceased relatives. Also, applicants must be either citizens or legal residents of Canada.

All members of my committee are volunteers and receive no pay, and none of the money for distribution will be spent on administrative costs, which will be sought from other sources. The members of the committee, though all of them are survivors themselves, will not become applicants. They will try their best to bring this long overdue problem to as early a solution as possible. A toll-free phone line will provide added information. Application forms will be distributed throughout the country to community centres, family service organizations, and offices of federations, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and survivor groups. A telephone call to any of these organizations will provide further information.

We will be forwarding the information to WJRO in the next few days, and application forms will be ready as soon as we receive WJRO's approval. All relevant information will be provided to Jewish public media across the country.

I am very grateful to my colleagues who have advised me and to the staff members who have done yeoman work. When it is all done I hope we will be able to look back on this sacred effort of providing assistance and be able to say s'char mitzvah, mitzvah – the reward of doing a mitzvah is having done it.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books

As usual, the market is flooded by a surfeit of newly published books Jewish readers will probably be interested in.

Published to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War, Hallie Lerman's Crying for Imma (Night Vision Press) is a poignant account of a momentous battle on the Golan Heights – a microcosm of the horrors of modern warfare – which claimed the lives of a group of courageous Israeli soldiers, including her 19-year-old cousin. It is generously illustrated.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On the 50th anniversary of Israel's birth, Zionism and the Creation of a New Society (Oxford University Press), by Ben Halpern and Jehuda Reinharz, is appropriately timed. In an erudite work, they study the ideological impulses which animated the Zionist movement.

In volumes three and four of his comprehensive, invaluable series, Futile Diplomacy (Frank Cass), Montreal historian Neil Caplan analyzes the attempts by the United Nations and the great powers to impose a peaceful settlement upon Israel and its Arab neighbors.

The assassination three years ago of Yitzhak Rabin still resonates. Michael Karpin and Ina Friedman, in Murder in the Name of God (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), present a stinging indictment of the myopic and dangerous right-wing forces that made his murder possible.

The convoluted relationship between the emergence of Israel and the Holocaust is the subject of Idith Zertal's From Catastrophe to Power (University of California Press), a scholarly interpretation of the clandestine immigration to Palestine of Jewish refugees.

Gerald Westerby's In Hostile Territory: Business Secrets of a Mossad Combatant (HarperCollins) is an odd hybrid, an occasionally compelling book that blends foreign intrigue with managerial techniques.

Apart from being a sacred language, Hebrew is a medium of divine communication, as Edward Hoffman persuasively demonstrates in The Hebrew Alphabet: A Mystical Journey (Raincoast).

Children will be delighted by Eric Kimmel's A Hanukkah Treasury (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), an inventive amalgam of legends, contemporary stories and games.

China scholar Vera Schwartz, in Bridge Across Broken Time (Yale University Press), explores a fresh theme: the meaning of cultural memory in Chinese and Jewish traditions. Original.

Kurt Weill, the great German-Jewish composer, is the subject of Jurgen Schebera's sympathetic biography, Kurt Weill: An Illustrated Life (Yale University Press).

The late Norton Simon of Los Angeles was a consummate tycoon (Hunt Foods) and a shrewd art collector. Suzanne Muchnic's engaging biography, Odd Man In (University of California Press), takes the measure of the man.

Media celebrity Abbie Hoffman seemed to be at the centre of the political and social tumult that convulsed the United States in the 1960s. Two empathetic biographies distill his essence – Larry Sloman's Seal This Dream (Doubleday) and Jonah Raskin's For the Hell of It (University of California Press). Another American counter-culture figure, the liberal journalist Nat Hentoff, has written his memoirs, and Speaking Freely (Alfred A. Knopf) is refreshingly candid.

Adam Worth (Wirth), an American Jew of German origin, was considered the pre-eminent criminal of the 19th century. Ben MacIntyre's book, The Napoleon of Crime (Douglas & McIntyre), stylishly summarizes his perfidious career.

Abraham Pais' autobiography, A Tale of Two Continents (Princeton University Press), is a workmanlike portrait of an illustrious theoretical physicist, both as a fugitive in Nazi-occupied Holland and as a renowned scientist in his adopted homeland, the United States.

Psychologist and educator Bruno Bettelheim was an exceedingly complex person who dwelled in perpetual controversy. In her brilliantly-researched biography, Bettelheim (HarperCollins), Nina Sutton draws a nuanced picture of this famous therapist.

All too often dreary, business journalism takes full flight in The Reichmanns (Times Books), Anthony Bianco's vibrant exploration of a Rothschildian Toronto clan, and in Titans (Penguin), Peter Newman's irreverent, sometimes racy examination of Canada's new business establishment (in which Jews play an integral role).

Aficionados of finely-honed prose will revel in two anthologies: American Jewish Fiction (University of Nebraska Press), edited by Gerald Shapiro and featuring the likes of Bernard Malamud and Cynthia Ozick, and The Oxford Book of Jewish Stories (Oxford University Press), edited by Ilan Stavans and presenting such luminaries as Shalom Aleichem and David Grossman.

There is no shortage of books concerning the Holocaust and its sister topic, the Third Reich. Herschel (Faber and Faber), by Andy Marino, relates the tragic story of Herschel Grynszpan, the Polish-Jewish teenager who touched off Kristallnacht in 1938. Survivor Manny Drukier, in Carved in Stone (University of Toronto Press), shares his memories of Poland, now and before the war, in a haunting memoir.

Dictionary of the Third Reich (Penguin), by James Taylor and Warren Shaw, is concise and readable. Laurence Rees' The Nazis: A Warning from History (The New Press), based on eye-witness testimonies, offers a vivid description of the rise and fall of Nazi Germany and the evolution of the Holocaust.

Culinary traditions

Food, apart from sustaining us, connects us with our ancestral roots. The following cookbooks, published recently, will appeal to a wide spectrum of readers who appreciate the pleasures of the table and its relationship with history.

Jews, having lived in Italy for 2,000 years, have developed a remarkable culinary tradition. Italian Jewish dishes, redolent of the flavors of Italy, Spain and the Middle East, are indeed worthy of celebration. And in Cucina Ebraica (Raincoast Books), Joyce Goldstein, a restaurant consultant, produces a lavishly illustrated book, awash in recipes and steeped in historical lore.

Joan Nathan is a food maven par excellence. Her latest book, Jewish Cooking in America (Random House), is a treasure trove reflecting three centuries of Jewish settlement in the United States. (Her PBS television series, Jewish Cooking in America with Joan Nathan, is currently being broadcast).

The paperback edition of Nathan's authoritative 1979 book, The Jewish Holiday Kitchen (Random House), contains mouth-watering recipes from all corners of the globe.

Marcy Goldman's A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking (Doubleday) is an outstanding contribution to the genre. Goldman, a master baker as well as a journalist, shows you how to bake fail-proof cakes, cookies, hamantaschen, mandelbrot, tarts, brownies, challahs, breads and bagels which your family will positively love. Her essay on Montreal bagels, supposedly the most sublime in Canada, is instructive.

Sephardic Jews will doubtless enjoy Cooking at the Kasbah and The Sultan's Kitchen, both of which are distributed by Raincoast Books. The first, by Kitty Morse, who was raised in Morocco, reveals the secrets of grilled meats, vegetable and fruit tangines, fragrantly spiced salads, couscous and savory pastries. The second book, by Ozcan Ozan, a seasoned chef, is a tantalizing compendium of classic Turkish fare.

Claudia Roden's latest offering, Invitation to Mediterranean Cooking (Raincoast Books), delves into the intricacies of a cusine well known to Jewish gourmets and gourmands. It's an attractive, richly illustrated volume which is every bit as good as her last one, A Book of Jewish Food.

The distortion of Chanukah

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the dubious triumphs of capitalism is that it reduces all religious impulses to a question of commercial viability. Hence, has Christmas been converted into a massive display of consumerism, with the actual religious significance and implications of the birth of Jesus now soft-pedalled in favor of junior's new bicycle.

In modernity, Christmas sings the cash register electric, transformed and denuded of any actual substance: out with the savior's arrival, and in with Bing Crosby, the department store window display, the portly man in the red suit. And it is precisely this dilution of a very distinct religious message – one that is clearly antithetical to Judaism – that has allowed the Christmas spirit and its treacly materialism to find itself resurrected, if you will, alive and burning in the heart of many a Jewish youngster.

My students cry foul to my grinch-like appraisal of their seduction at the hands of the corporate Christmas machine. "What's wrong with Christmas?" they ponder. "It's not a religious holiday anyway. We like the songs and the movies and it's just a nice time of year." What's wrong indeed?

The grand inquisition of contemporary life destroys Jews not through anything so crude as forcible conversion or physical torture. The threat here is far more subtle and thus twice as insidious. If Christmas "isn't really about Christianity," then the Jew can enjoy it without inconvenient feelings of guilt or even betrayal. It's not about Jesus, Ma, it's about Frank Capra.

Many Jewish children are given a Hobbesian tour of Hebrew or Sunday school – it is nasty, brutish, and short. I recall afternoons spent listening to teachers talk about biblical figures and ritual customs that I felt, at the time, had absolutely nothing to do with the life I was then living – or trying to learn how to live. It wasn't until many years later, teaching the poet John Milton to second year undergraduates at the University of Toronto, that I realized that the "Hebrew school blues" was really just a Jewish example of a widespread phenomenon.

Verse after verse of Paradise Lost alluded to the New Testament, but the sources were utterly foreign to my predominantly Christian students. An entire generation had turned off of God and certainly off of organized religion. When I asked them if they had learned the Bible as kids, their amused countenances and sheepish stories of boredom in church told me that we had led parallel lives to that extent.

But Christian disinterest in their faith takes its own ironic toll on Jews. It blurs the distinctive and serious disagreements between the two religions, and causes Jews to lose track of their own identity. Today's youth of all religions, actually share a common language that is utterly secularized. The theology of the Talmud versus that of the church fathers is an utterly irrelevant dispute; what really counts is the Knicks against the Bulls.

Perhaps most sadly, what the shadow of Christmas inevitably leads to is the distortion of Chanukah among modern Jewry. Intimidated by the mess o'presents at the foot of the tree, Jewish kids and parents have managed to transform Chanukah into our own version of the winter shopping spree. As someone aptly quipped, if Chanukah comes before Christmas, it's an inoculation; if it follows, then it's an antidote.

But Jewish holidays become absurd when they are relegated to reactionary status. It is time to reclaim Chanukah for what it is — a celebration of the Jewish determination to remain committed to Judaism even in the face of immense cultural pressure. As Shlomo Carlebach once said, the whole world is waiting for the Jews to be Jews.

A look at ancient Jewish coins

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at Chanukah Gelt resources on the World Wide Web.

This week, the real stuff: ancient Jewish coins.

Ancient coins present us with an almost unique opportunity: to hold and even own an authentic part of our culture. And the Internet is a great place to learn about these coins, even to buy them. But before you spend a cent, know what you are doing.

For a good introduction into the history of minting in the Land of Israel, drop by the Israel Museum [http://www.imj.org.il/archaeology/coins.htm]. Coins were first minted in Gaza about 400 BCE and later in Jerusalem about 500 years later. The earliest coin known to be minted in Jerusalem bears a picture of a lily and the word "Yehud." In what was an incredible symmetry with the past, the Bank of Israel reproduced this same design when it issued its One New Sheqel coin in 1985 [http://www.bankisrael.gov.il///catal/c39.htm].

The story of the Dead Sea Scrolls and their discovery in 1947 by young Beduin shepherds is well-known [http://sunsite.unc.edu/expo/deadsea.scrolls.exhibit/intro.html]. Less known, is that eight years later, archeologists came across three intact ceramic vessels containing a total of 561 silver coins under a doorway at Qumran. There is speculation that they had been the property of new members who had to surrender their worldly goods to the treasurer of the community in order to join the sect [http://fddisunsite.oit.unc.edu/expo/deadsea.scrolls.exhibit/Community/coins.html].

Many Internet sites offer ancient Judaean coins for sale [http://www.bitsofhistory.com/judean.html]. With Chanukah almost here, what could be more timely than a Hasmonean Prutah coin with the Hebrew inscription "Yehonatan the High Priest and the Council of Jews." ($15)

If you have a deeper wallet, you can purchase Judaean coins from the Persian, Greek, Roman, First and Second Revolt periods for up to $600 [http://members. aol.com/coinsold/fcatalog.html#Judaean].

But before you buy, be careful! In Ancient Coins & Modern Fakes [http://www.mindspring.com/~kroh/Empirecoins/fakes.html], Dennis Kroh writes about notorious and common coin scams. "There have been forgeries of ancient coins for as long as there has been coinage." Novices to coin collecting are amazed that coins of the ancient world are obtainable at all for any price (They are all in museums, aren't they!) Kroh says it's no wonder that, when a tourist purchases an "ancient" coin or two, they are usually paying much more for a counterfeit than what the authentic item would cost. Although his essay doesn't focus on Israel or Internet sales, many virtual travellers should keep its lessons in mind.

For more advice, join the online community of numismatists NUMISM-L Ancient and Medieval Coin List [http://www.bitsofhistory.com/numism-l.html]. And don't miss The American Israel Numismatic Association [http://www.amerisrael.com/]. The association was established to study Israel's coinage, past and present.

You can subscribe to their newsletter, The Shekel and get discounts on Israeli coins or medals. But if you're really crazy about Jewish coins and are ready to graduate from the virtual experience, consider joining the association next March, when they embark on a 15-day study tour of Israel [http://www.amerisrael.com/tour.html].

One of the tour's highlights: a special anniversary reception by the Israel Government Coins & Medals Corporation.

Rabbinic Reflections

A forgotten lesson

By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

Chanukah celebrates the rededication of the Temple in Jerusalem. For eight nights, we light candles to commemorate the miracle of the oil. Yet clearly there is so much more to the story.

One element that is particularly significant today is revealed in the attitudes of our ancestors to Jewish life and traditions.

In the First Book of Maccabees we find: "At that time there came forth from Israel certain lawless men who persuaded many, saying: 'Let us go and make a treaty with the heathen around us, because ever since we separated from them, many evils have come upon us.' The plan seemed good in their eyes, and some of the people went eagerly to the king, who gave them permission to perform the rites of the heathen. They built a gymnasium in Jerusalem in accordance with the custom of the heathen. They also subjected themselves to uncircumcision and stood aloof from the sacred Law."

In their desire to be just like the rest of the Greek world, there were some Jews who accepted the Greek condemnation of the brit milah, the covenant symbolized by circumcision. It was not enough that they were prepared to forgo brit milah for their sons. They were ready to undergo a painful surgery in a world without anesthesia, in order to eradicate the covenant incised in the flesh.

A few verses later in the same chapter, the author records: "In accordance with the decree, they put to death the women who had circumcised their children, hanging the newborn babies around their necks; and they also put to death their families as well as those who had circumcised them. Nevertheless, many in Israel were firmly resolved in their hearts not to eat unclean food. They preferred to die rather than be defiled by food or break the holy covenant, and they did die."

For these Jews there was no question about the sanctity of brit milah. It was a divine command. One that in the face of persecution had to be observed even though it might mean death.

Once again, there are elements in the world challenging brit milah. The Jewish community need not fear those who find circumcision medically unnecessary. I cannot judge if it is medically advisable for males to be circumcised. For me as a Jew, the question is irrelevant. We do not circumcise our sons. We enter them into the covenant symbolized by the circumcision. We do not attend a circumcision but a brit.

It is significant that the shortened form we use to describe the ceremony in Yiddish is the word bris, covenant, and not the word milah, circumcision. This is not a medical procedure, although every mohel must be proficient in the medical aspects. This is a religious ritual. It is a mitzvah incumbent upon the believing Jew.

There is another threat that is more worrisome. There are those who, perhaps with sincere intentions, seeking to prevent such abuses as female circumcision, have lumped male circumcision together with female circumcision. They are prepared to make laws banning all forms of circumcision. Some Jews caught up in the the rhetoric are prepared to abandon a practice that our ancestors were prepared to die for.

As we light our chanukiyot celebrating the escape from the dangers of those days so long ago, we must remind ourselves that some of those dangers are with us here today. We are Jews, celebrating Chanukah because our ancestors were not prepared to accept the judgment of the Greeks that their way was better than the Jewish way. We must not allow the modern Greeks to win today.

Celebrating in a new home

By SUSAN BERRIN

Yossi's bar mitzvah, parshat Toldot, fell on the third weekend of November.

We were barely in our new home. The stacks of boxes were just unpacked, or at least out of sight in the attic. As I approached the bar mitzvah, I wondered if it would serve as another re-entry ritual into the community that had drawn us from across the continent.

Certainly our synagogue life here was different. We were no longer the rabbinic family. In Newton, from the outside there was little that would distinguish us from the many other rabbis and families attending shul.

Rather than living at the pulse of shul activity, we were on the sidelines. We had little rabbinic opportunity to touch people's lives in the profound and meaningful ways we had been accustomed to in Victoria. We would have to begin anew the process of creating identities for ourselves, reinventing our strengths and building the contributions we could offer towards community.

In Newton, we were gingerly stepping into two very different shuls: one liberal Orthodox, the other traditional egalitarian. Such a way to describe groups of people! But it was these two groups that had wooed us from our 16-year tenure in the Garden of Eden. And, while I'll try here to describe these two shul communities, I hope I can convey the nuances, the depths, as well as the highly polished surfaces.

The Orthodox shul is a place I would never have imagined myself joining. We had become part of this shul the year of our sabbatical, initially as a way to support our eldest daughter. As a student at the Orthodox high school, she found this shul the place to "hang."

We had been warmly greeted and ushered into the Shabbes lunch line-up. For weeks, I hardly cooked. And after all those lunches with perfect strangers who eagerly wanted to know about our lives and what brought us to Newton, it was time to reciprocate.

Of course, there's a lot more to this community than great Shabbes lunches: a compassionate and learned rabbi; women who are seriously engaging Halachah and yet stretching its elasticity to find their own voices; an enthusiasm and joyfulness at observing each moment of Jewish life.

The egalitarian minyan is traditional in its prayer service, but offers women complete equality of participation. It is the community I feel most myself in, the place my spirit can shine. It has little structure, no edifice (we meet in a church) and no employed professionals. The minyan meets only for Shabbat morning and the festivals. Its members support the social and political causes I believe in and sing the tunes I'm familiar with.

Yossi's bar mitzvah was held at the minyan. We invited many members of the Orthodox shul, and hoped the traditional egalitarian service would not offend their sensibilities. It is to the credit of both groups that participation was so genuine. While straddling these two communities poses challenges, I've always enjoyed an eclectic web of friendship and affiliation.

The details of planning the bar mitzvah were immense, but finally Shabbat arrived. Close to 60 people crowded into our living room Friday evening. In that room were most of our two families – a good representation from Toronto – and the friends from Victoria who had come to be with us. We were not only eating a Shabbat meal together, we were creating our first memory in our new home.

Saturday morning, Yossi seemed quite calm walking to the "shul" (which had been converted from a school gym to a beit knesset for our benefit). New friends helped enormously with the details of Saturday morning preparation, weaving themselves forever into our hearts. With poise, Yossi chanted from the Torah and haftorah and delivered an insightful speech.

When I spoke to Yossi, I tried to connect the Torah portion and its narrative of family strife to our lives, telling him that family is the central core of our existence. Through even the most difficult period of the move last year, we still felt safe and adventurous because we knew we'd be moving as a family, and for the family.

A welcome anthology

Day by Day — Reflections on the Themes of the Torah from Literature, Philosophy, and Religious Thought*, by Chaim Stern (Oxford Press, $44).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Over the years, I have put together a small library of books that deal with quotations, maxims, apothegms and gems of insight and sagacity. These books offer a rich composite of spirituality and practical wisdom, and enable the reader to discover, or rediscover ideas that incarnate faith, endurance, hope, pathos, brilliance and wit.

Each of the 54 chapters in Rabbi Stern's anthology offers an excerpt from the week's Torah reading and nurturing quotations connected with every day of the week. These 400 or so brief selections are derived from many sources – from Jewish and other religious traditions and from a large group of well known poets, scientists and philosophers.

This lovingly compiled miscellany will find an honored place in my ever growing accumulation of similar books.

Some selections from Day by Day:

• Rabbi Abraham Yaakov of Sadagora was asked: According to our sages in Pirke Avot, there is not a thing that has not its place. So humanity too, has its own place. Why then, do people sometimes feel so crowded? He replied, because each wants to occupy the place of the other. (Chassidic)

• One year, the school of Shammai and the school of Hillel were at odds. Another year, and a third. Each held to its way. A voice from beyond then proclaimed: The words of both are the words of the living God, but the school of Hillel's way is the one to follow. Why? Though both followed the living God, the school of Hillel's way was gentle, conciliatory; they would teach their own view and that of their opponents, and give priority to the school of Shamai – [thus we learn that] the Holy One exalts those who humble themselves, and humbles those who exalt themselves (Talmud)

• Strange is our situation here upon earth. Each of us comes for a short visit, not knowing why, yet sometimes seeming to divine a purpose. From the standpoint of daily life, however, there is one thing we do know: that we are here for the sake of others; above all, for those on whose smile and well-being our own happiness depends; and also for the countless unknown souls with whose fate we are connected by a bond of sympathy. Many times a day, I realize how much my own outer and inner life is built upon the labors of others, both living and dead, and how earnestly I must exert myself in order to give in return as much as I have received and am still receiving. (Albert Einstein)

• Rabbi Leib, son of Sarah, the hidden saint who wandered the earth and its rivers and valleys redeeming dead and living souls, said this: I went to the Great Maggid, not to hear him say Torah, but to see his way of unlacing his boots and lacing them up again. (Chassidic)

• Rabbi Israel Salanter saw a servant girl carrying two pails of water on her shoulder. When dinner was ready, he used only a few drops in washing his hands. When asked why he did not use more water, he replied: One must not be generous with a mitzvah on another person's shoulders. (Jewish anecdote)

• As it is possible to abuse things that are permitted, so is it possible to sin by abstaining from the right use of these things – such as food, sex, and all else that God made and called "very good." We will be called to account for our abstinence from these permitted things. (Talmud)

• If one were given five minutes' warning before sudden death, five minutes to say what it had all meant to us, every telephone booth would be occupied by people trying to call up other people to stammer that they loved them. (Christopher Morley)

• When the Nazis first came for the Communists, I didn't speak up, because I was not a Communist. Then they came for the Jews, but I didn't speak up, because I was not a Jew. They came for the trade unionists, but I didn't speak up, because I was not a trade unionist. They came for me... and by that time there was no one to speak up for anyone. (Martin Niemoeller)

• The days come and go like muffled and veiled figures sent from a distant friendly party, but they say nothing, and if we do not use the gifts they bring, they carry them as silently away. (Ralph Waldo Emerson)

• A general received a message telling him that his main line of defence had been broken by the enemy. He was greatly distressed and the expression on his face showed it. His wife, hearing of the message, came to him and said. You have received bad news, I know, but I have just received worse. And what is that, he asked. I have just read discouragement on your face, she replied. Loss of courage is the worst of news. (Chassidic)

The mandate of The CJN is to be the very best community newspaper that it can be. Our core activity, of course, is to provide the news from around the Jewish world, credibly, reliably and as comprehensively as possible, given the limitation of our resources and our weekly format.

In an attempt to stretch our mandate even higher, on Oct. 27, we inaugurated The CJN Roundtable Discussion.

The roundtable discussion, to be held three or four times a year, will provide a forum, in addition to the pages of this newspaper, for the free-wheeling exchange of ideas on contemporary issues of importance to the Jewish community, locally, nationally and abroad.

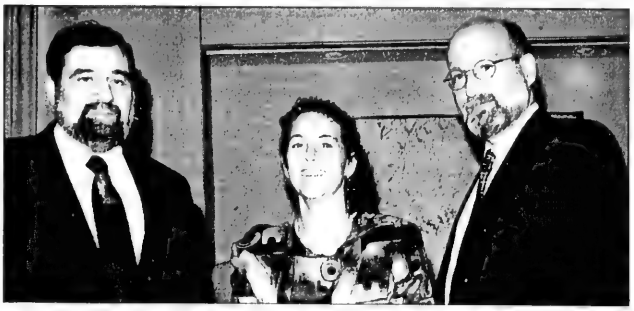
We hope in this way, to inspire "new" thinking or perhaps to consolidate "old" thinking on topics and questions that matter to us a great deal.

Each roundtable discussion brings together a panel of three renowned, acknowledged experts on specific topics, along with a number of individuals also interested and involved in that field of inquiry.

The proceedings of each roundtable will be published in these pages for the benefit of the wider public.

It is our hope that The CJN Roundtable Discussion will eventually become a deeply-embedded and highly-anticipated part of the intellectual life of our community.

The first roundtable discussion, held at the law offices of Goodman and Carr, explored the subject "The Jews of Toronto: who we are and what we can yet be." Forty people attended.



Roundtable panelists (from left) Gary Levine, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and Jay Brodbar.

Our distinguished panel comprised Jay Brodbar, director of research, UJA Federation; Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning; and Gary Levine, lifelong career educator, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The following report is a summary of the discussion that day.

The first roundtable will lead to many more. Look to the pages of The CJN for news of the next roundtable discussion.

Toronto – Canada's Jewish hub

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

As Director of Research and Assistant Director of Community Planning and Allocations of UJA Federation, Jay Brodbar is, in effect, the Toronto Jewish community's chief demographer. He has also been a pioneer in the use of the Internet as an outlet for information dissemination, and helped build Jewish Toronto, the community's site on the World Wide Web.

A sociologist, Brodbar has master's and doctoral degrees from the University of Wisconsin. While on the faculty of Brandeis University, he taught in the Near East and Judaic Studies department and in the Hornstein School of Jewish Communal Service. He has published numerous papers on the American Jewish family.

Prior to coming to Toronto, Brodbar spent two years in Israel as a Jerusalem Fellow, a program aimed at encouraging Jewish educational leadership.

TORONTO — Toronto the Good, for Jews at least, is Toronto the Booming.

The city and environs are home to nearly half of all Canadian Jews, and while the rest of the country may be loath to admit it, Toronto has become Canada's Jewish hub.

The city teems with Jewish life: new synagogues and day schools are popping up all the time; programs, lectures and the Jewish arts scene can fill a calendar; and levels of commitment and diversity are the envy of other cities.

What community planners seem to have handled remarkably well has been the astonishing growth of the Jewish population. In the past 25 years, it has doubled, and today stands at roughly 175,000, placing it 11th in Diaspora urban populations, above Greater Washington (165,000) and below Miami (190,000).

Data culled from various surveys and studies have provided demographers (experts in population trends) with a veritable mother-lode of data, offering scads of information on age, income, occupation, affiliation, levels of religious practice, education and other variables.

Population studies also speak volumes about one of our favorite parlor games: comparing ourselves to Americans.

The Toronto community's rapid growth and change has kept Jay Brodbar busy. It's his job to pore over the mountains of numbers available on Toronto Jewry, and interpret their meanings, as well as to try and divine the population's future needs.

At The CJN's recent roundtable, Brodbar crunched some numbers, mainly those contained in a 1991 study by the federation, entitled A First Look. Written by Brodbar, it surveyed 1,400 Jewish homes in and around Toronto, and still provides what he called the most reliable information on Jewish contours in the community.

The study found that of Greater Toronto's total population of 3.8 million, 162,605 people were Jewish, or 4.2 percent of the city's total.

Today, he said, the total Jewish population is closer to 175,000. Between 1981 and 1991, the Jewish population increased by 25 percent, whereas growth in other Jewish urban centres in Canada averaged six percent. Overall, Toronto's Jewish community has doubled in size since 1973.

Some of the most dramatic growth has been in York Region, home to some 50,000 Jews, making it, on its own, Canada's third largest Jewish community, Brodbar noted.

The community is still "fairly concentrated" in residential and geographical patterns, he said, pointing out that 90 percent of Jews live where only 20 percent of the rest of the population resides.

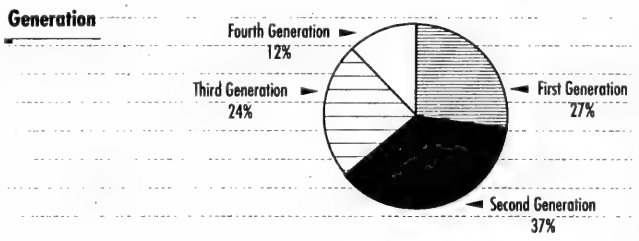
For example, 13 percent of North York is Jewish; 19 percent of Vaughan is Jewish; 40 percent of Thornhill (in both Vaughan and Markham) is Jewish; while some neighborhoods in Thornhill and Toronto are up to 80 percent Jewish.

On the other hand, some 46,000 Jews live in areas that are under 10 percent Jewish.

There have been two reasons for all this phenomenal growth, Brodbar offered: the natural birth rate is one, but "the greatest impact" has been the movement of people.

Between 1981 and 1991, Toronto saw an influx of 30,000 newcomers, split evenly between immigrants (those from outside Canada) and migrants (those from within Canada.)

Three-quarters of all immigrants came from the former Soviet Union, Israel and South Africa. These Jews tended to have a more traditional family structure, to be poorer and, with the exception of the former Soviets, to be younger than indigenous Jews.



(But Brodbar noted that over the past 20 years, the economic gap between immigrant and indigenous Jews has narrowed "and just about disappeared.")

Brodbar dispelled a prevailing belief that most migrants to Toronto are ex-Montrealers: Of the 15,000 Canadians who came here in the decade prior to 1991, 10,000 were from other parts of Ontario.

Migrants also tended to be younger and better educated, and to form a higher proportion of professionals than Jews born here. Brodbar said migrants from within Ontario tended to come with families, whereas those arriving from elsewhere in Canada came more as singles.

Toronto also has a high proportion of Jewish elderly: One out of five Jewish residents is 65 and over. (In York Region, the ratio is just three percent – a "very dramatic difference," Brodbar stated.) Some Toronto neighborhoods are over 50 percent elderly. But not all Jewish elderly live among non-Jews. For example, one-third of all residents in Bathurst Manor are Jews over 65, compared to just six percent of non-Jewish elderly.

"So it's not only that they are different by virtue of being Jewish," Brodbar explained, "but they are also different by virtue of being elderly."

And, he added, Toronto Jewry has also caught up with, if not exceeded, the general ratio of under 14s. Sixteen percent of the Jewish population is under 14. In York Region, a bedroom community, fully one-third of the population is under 14.

Canadian Jews often liken themselves to their U.S. counterparts, but Brodbar cautioned that comparisons can be misleading, partly because the leading religious denomination south of the border is Reform, whereas in Toronto, it's Conservative.

He underlined other gaps with our American co-religionists:

The main one, intermarriage, shows that Toronto, as suspected, is miles ahead of the American national average. Here, nine percent of adults were married to someone who was not born Jewish; the figure stateside was 32 percent. (However, Brodbar added, Toronto's intermarriage rate between 1980 and 1990 was double that of older marriages.)

In Toronto, 73 percent of adults said all or almost all their friends were Jewish; in the United States, the figure was 38 percent.

Studies consistently show that most American Jews have never visited Israel; in Toronto, two-thirds of Jews have gone at least once. Toronto Jews also do "very well" when it comes to ritual practice, such as lighting Shabbat candles, attending a seder or keeping kashrut.

Forty percent of Toronto Jewish adults were immigrants; two-thirds were either first or second generation Canadians, and just 12 percent were fourth generation, with at least one grandparent born in North America. In the United States, the last figure was 38 percent – what Brodbar called "a very important factor."

In sum, Toronto's Jewish community can be more accurately compared to Baltimore's than to Vancouver's, while the one in Vancouver has more in common with San Diego's, Brodbar said.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, was ordained from Hebrew Union College in 1983. She served as assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple before taking a pulpit outside Boston. Under Rabbi Goldstein's direction for the past seven years, Kolel has grown from six classes with 40 students to 14 classes with approximately 250 students. It offers events that reach about 1,500 people a year. She spoke at the recent CJN Roundtable on Toronto's Jews: Who We Could Be.

TORONTO — Synagogues must boldly ask what they can do to answer the spiritual needs of people who are not getting their needs answered, said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, who has broken new ground at Kolel by teaching traditional texts to Jewish students from a variety of backgrounds in the context of Reform Judaism.

This city's best hope for Jewish affiliation is a group she has identified as "temporarily unaffiliated."

The group consists mostly of singles, young couples without children, couples with teens or empty nesters, she said. They feel they have either gotten what they need from synagogues, or have not yet gotten what they need.

In her work with Kolel, Rabbi Goldstein has identified two other types of Jews who are not affiliated with a synagogue: permanently unaffiliated and hostilely unaffiliated.

The former group, contrary to popular assumption, does have a Jewish identity, she said, but finds Jewish meaning outside the synagogue, perhaps through involvement in a Jewish community centre or Jewish cultural events such as the Jewish Film Festival.

The assumption that permanently unaffiliated Jews aren't religious is erroneous, said Rabbi Goldstein. "Many of these Jews light Shabbat candles, have Passover seders, keep kosher, have lifecycle events – with or without rabbis, but...they will probably remain out of synagogue life no matter how clever our marketing strategies."

"Hostilely" unaffiliated Jews are "turned off," said Rabbi Goldstein, not mincing words. This group sees synagogue life as "boring, empty and stale...In essence, they claim that synagogues are not spiritual experiences."

Rabbis and other affiliated Jews tend to dismiss their claims, she said. "If only they would join our synagogue, they would find the perfect experience, [but] we remain frustrated."

A large percentage of the hostilely unaffiliated students at Kolel are marginalized Jews in their 20s, 30s and 40s, said Rabbi Goldstein.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Obvious marginalized categories, she said, include gay Jews, disabled Jews, Jews who are poor, Jews who do not live in the Bathurst corridor, Jews who are intermarried, and a large number of converted Jews who do not feel truly accepted.

Although they represent the smallest group statistically, she feels they are the group to be most concerned about, because they are the next generation.

In a recent Basic Judaism class, they told her they feel excluded from the Jewish community because their other "isms" – like vegetarianism, feminism and political activism – are more meaningful to them, and they have not found a way to synthesize those "isms" with their Judaism.

"They feel that the Jewish community disdains or devalues the other isms if Judaism doesn't come first."

Another common reason for feeling excluded was money, Rabbi Goldstein noted. Some feel they don't make enough money to sit in the established Jewish community and feel equal, she said. One of her students wanted to build a sukkah, and purchase a lulav and etrog, but couldn't afford it.

Neither were these students comfortable with perceived assumptions about what being Jewish means in Toronto – that Jews are married, heterosexual, have children, and live in the Bathurst Street corridor.

A separate issue was the feeling that the denominations are adversarial and cause conflict. Many who are new to Toronto don't understand the issues between the denominations, and find it hard to just identify as a Jew, Rabbi Goldstein said.

"We need to start talking about ways to settle the issues of territoriality between the movements." In her experience, the community's best hope is with the Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements.

While there is an assumption that affiliated Jews form "a monolithic bloc of dues-paying synagogue members," Rabbi Goldstein has also found three categories of synagogue members.

• "In transition" Jews are not necessarily loyal to their synagogue, rabbi or denomination, but are satisfied in the meantime. "They may have been raised Orthodox, and find themselves in a Reform synagogue because they like the rabbi. They may have been raised Reform, and find themselves in an Orthodox synagogue because they've met people in their neighborhood who go there.

"These kinds of affiliatives often move from one congregation to another, and we lose them in the shift sometimes."

• "Denominationally attached" Jews believe in the teachings and values of their particular synagogue and denomination. They generally remain affiliated.

• "Historically affiliated" Jews belong to the synagogue their parents belonged to. In most cases, Rabbi Goldstein has found, they don't like it but won't switch.

The hostilely unaffiliated will remain hostile, she said. She suggested that synagogues do membership surveys to ask members what they want.

The best way to reach out to the temporarily unaffiliated, Rabbi Goldstein believes, is to offer experiences which answer their needs.

The permanently unaffiliated will find other spiritual outlets, which need to be seen as normative experiences, she said. They might include spirituality Shabbat chavurot, High Holy Day observances geared for unaffiliated Jews, and "non-service" services.

Rabbi Goldstein would also like to see better, more reciprocal relationships between synagogues and Jewish agencies. "We rabbis often feel used by Jewish agencies," she said. "We are asked to announce news or events from the bimah, raise money for this or that organization, [use] this or that Shabbat theme."

She also believes Jewish agencies and synagogue boards need to have more "non-establishment types of Jews" on their boards. They "have what to teach us about the kind of community that we can be."

'No time to rest on our education laurels'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Gary Levine has worked with young people for many years. His positions have included director of Camp Moshava, principal of the Orah School for Russian immigrants, and educational consultant to various activities of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation.

He is now director of student activities and a teacher of Talmud and Tanach at CHAT.

TORONTO — While the education scene in Toronto is remarkably healthy, this is no time to rest on our laurels, Gary Levine asserted at the first CJN Roundtable on the Toronto Jewish community.

Levine said that "there are few cities in the Diaspora that can boast the breadth of choice that Toronto has to offer," citing as examples "some two dozen day schools and yeshivot, Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, non-denominational, Sephardi and Ashkenazi; a school for students with learning disabilities, a school for children with severe handicaps; as well as supplementary school programs."

This is besides Jewish community centres, camps, youth groups, Israel Experience Program and March of the Living, he said.

In fact, Toronto is so well known for the quality of its educational efforts, that Levine quoted the director of an organization that was considering a pilot project to fund thousands of youngsters on extended trips to Israel as saying that he wouldn't use Toronto as a pilot because "the community runs so well that we wouldn't be able to tell if the program were successful in itself or if it was just successful because of the city."

However, Levine said, teaching about Judaism simply isn't enough. "We need commitment," he asserted. "Not necessarily religious commitment, not necessarily commitment to move to Israel, but a personal sense of obligation that we each need to develop toward however it is we define our Jewishness."

This commitment, he said, may be to community, to good deeds or to study, but it must be "a personal acceptance of obligation to do, to be, to become."

He praised the bar and bat mitzvah programs being run by many Reform congregations in the city, "in which students study text, do service to the community, consider together who they are and what they want to be and decide on their own personal commitment, which then forms part of their bar or bat mitzvah ceremony."

Gary Levine

Levine said that he strongly supports what he called "affective" education.

"The strong emotional connection that a child develops in participating in a Shabbaton or spending a few weeks in Israel or a summer in a really good Jewish camp cannot be matched by a hundred classes in text or a hundred research papers."

On the other hand, he said, "A Jew should know what is in the Bible, what our leaders through the ages have taught, what the holidays are and how we honor them."

Such a combination of affective and cognitive education may make intermarriage or assimilation less likely, Levine said, but is no guarantee against it.

"We live in a secular world," he said, where "the influences of the media are pervasive."

Youngsters are more likely to know Silent Night than the second verse of Maoz Tsur, he said. "They don't sit down to learn it. It's just everywhere in a society that is overwhelmingly Christian."

More serious, Levine suggested, is the notion he heard from a student who demanded, "Doesn't Judaism teach that anything is okay if it's between two consenting adults?"

Levine called that philosophy "not Torah, but the Playboy philosophy, first espoused by that prophet of our time, Hugh Hefner."

He lamented that "We are teaching a great deal about Judaism and Jewishness, but our students are learning at least as much about the secular culture around them through osmosis, through the excitement of being a young person in an exciting world."

It is not enough either, he said, to restrict Judaism to "sadness over the Holocaust and pride in Israel. There are too many Jews in our time who are sad about the Holocaust and proud of Israel, and think about them three or four times a year, and have no personal connection with their Judaism at all."

We must, said Levine, "educate toward commitment."

This will "require a rethinking of some of our definitions of community and a major community investment of time and resources – for that read 'money' – to achieve it."

In the European shtetl and ghetto, he said, the whole environment of the young Jew consisted of the home the shul and the cheder – there were no other influences.

Now, however, that world is gone forever, Levine said. He urged the community to "consider how best we can utilize the home, the shul and the school, and in our time so many available agencies and institutions of the organized Jewish community – working together in a structured, coordinated manner – to maximize the Jewish world of our students and to help them develop their own personal sense of commitment."

Levine believes that, unlike New York, where "what Jewish education was about was: If you can afford the tuition, you can go to school; if you can't, you've got a problem. It was seen as axiomatic that each segment of the community would take care of its own as well as it could, and if there were those that got lost in the shuffle, well, you could do the best you could do." Communities in Canada have had the ability to work together; "in fact,[a] dedication to working together."

This dedication, Levine said, "led them to centralize fundraising, streamline administration and act together for the greater good of the community. This doesn't mean that the Orthodox danced fox trots at the Reform weddings. It just means that the community leadership was able to focus on issues of common purpose and common need, and to leave the questions that divided them outside the door."

Levine said that he has real fears that "this avoidance of ideological confrontation is in some danger in our time. Reflecting the dissonance in Jewish communities across North America and the rest of the world, we are seeing, not only polarization and accusation, but partisan demands entering the board rooms of community leadership."

In the near future, he asked, "Will we still be able to join together for the good of the community, or will we find separate communal services for the different denominations? Separate schools for each side, all of them inadequately funded, and the gulf between as wide as the Red Sea?"

To help today's children "meet the increasingly complex challenges of North American society, we are going to have to regain the unity of purpose and direction that build our Jewish community, and we are going to have to actively develop ways to increase the influence our community has on our children."

Exploring the future of Toronto Jewry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the more animated points in the discussion began when sociologist Jay Brodbar contended that the core issues facing Toronto Jews are "content and ideological" in nature.

Addressing that issue, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein said Toronto is home to a large group of disenfranchised Jews who live on the margins of the established community. Creating a dialogue between established community members and "the Jews we're losing" is difficult, she said.

Recent arrivals from cities like Winnipeg and Edmonton see "the Toronto Jewish community as closed. If you weren't born in Toronto, bar mitzvahed in Toronto and [attended] the same camp, you're out."

Toronto is seen as "establishment, traditional, conservative" without room for anything else. "It may be the wrong perception, but it's still there," Rabbi Goldstein said.

Longtime educator Gary Levine waded into the discussion by asserting the viability and vitality of an organization is connected to the amount of argument it can withstand.

But, he continued, "there are things we're not going to resolve... We are different and we have our own beliefs. Even within the community there are things you are not going to resolve.

"I'm Orthodox. I cannot by my religious background pray in a Reform synagogue. I have a friend who is Reform and she says she is personally insulted by coming into an Orthodox synagogue and being sent to sit on the other side of the barrier. We're not going to resolve that. There are basic philosophic differences, or in my case, religious dogma differences, which mean we've reached an impasse."

Concentrating on those differences, "will separate us so that we are not able to sit around the table to discuss issues we can resolve," Levine said.

Levine's statement prompted a comment from Gordon Wolfe, executive-director of Jewish Family and Child Service. He noted the agency recently had to schedule an extra meeting by a visiting rabbinic expert on spousal abuse because organizers could not get Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis to attend the same meeting.

"This kind of divisiveness makes me crazy," Wolfe said.

Levine agreed that in principle, it was a shame that people would not sit together in that situation.

"On the other hand, you have resolved it," he said. "In effect, you have reached a resolution that solves all the problems imperfectly, but nonetheless, in a unified manner. I think that's exactly the kind of thing that may be necessary, but which leads ultimately to retaining unity in the community [through a] hybrid, Rube Goldberg solution."

That statement prompted an immediate response from Rabbi Goldstein, who argued "that solution perpetuates the problem. It perpetuates the ongoing, adversarial nature of the rabbinic associations in this town."

Look at it from the perspective of a Jew on the margins of the organized community who is interested in "coming back home to Judaism" and who is interested in hearing the speaker, she said.

"That Jew just doesn't get it and doesn't understand why we can't all listen to a great scholar talking about something that is not even dogmatic.

"The marginalized Jew or the Jew just coming back just doesn't get it. That's where people say 'I give up, I don't want any part of it,'" Goldstein said.

"In this particular case, which group of rabbis would you have told not to come?" Levine asked.

The rabbis should have met and resolved the issue through dialogue, Rabbi Goldstein responded. Perhaps "it may not happen at all or you find a way for people to learn to work together."

"If you can't do it, better that they meet separately than we say to one, 'you are no longer welcome,'" Levine asserted. "If there is a better solution, we should try to find it. But the solution that includes, however imperfectly, is to be preferred over the solution that ultimately has to exclude. The imperfection of it is what is so problematic.

"We all have this one-person vision of unity. Of course everyone has a different vision of unity. [It may be] unity my way or unity your way, but we all have such a vision. When one gets down to the nitty gritty of how to do it, then we find ourselves having to live with imperfect solutions...One deals with it as well as one can."

The discussion then changed course, with guest Shlomo Sharon raising the question of Jewish education. Jewish education in Toronto is "almost one area of optimism," Brodbar said. "You find that is one of the few areas of growth..."

Levine offered a more pessimistic assessment, noting that while Toronto is a "strong, active, vital community," Jewish communities in outlying areas are diminishing at Toronto's expense."They're coming here. The question is, in 50 years from now, are we all still here?

"Many more people are coming into Jewish education now...We're going to have to work with them. That means we'll have to find methods that satisfy the much broader community. In some sense it was easier when you had the little Orthodox school there, and the little Conservative school there and the little Reform school there and everyone was making Shabbat for himself. At that point there was a clear understanding of what we stood for in a very tightly constructed way. Now we are serving a much broader community and as it gets larger, we will be serving it more broadly still.

"We will have to compromise, reach consensus in a North America that is going to have fewer and fewer Jewish communities, larger ones perhaps, more centralized. I don't know where we are going to be. I am afraid."

Responding to the panelists' concerns about education and Jews on the margins, Syd Eisen pointed out that Toronto's Jewish education system has registered significant accomplishments in educating the affiliated Jews of "the centre."

Education funding is limited, he said. "We [shouldn't] forget the inside, the good strong centre while we're talking about the outside. I think if we put all our resources in trying to bring in the Jew who has chosen or who by accident has not been affiliated and forget the people on the inside who want to send their children to get a Jewish education and can't do it, then I think we'll be making a mistake."

That elicited this response from Rabbi Goldstein: "Some of our best insiders started out as outsiders...All the complaints of the outsiders you'll hear from the insiders as well."

Brodbar noted that "the vast proportion of our resources are devoted to the core. It's not enough. That's the hard part. Talking about scarce resources is the debate in the Jewish community. How do you spend scarce resources?"

At that point, historian Irving Abella raised an existential question: "Aside from religion, what makes us Jews? What is there aside from the Torah, what is there aside from the synagogue" that will appeal to unaffiliated Jews? he asked.

Levine said "the reality is there is no one way to identify as a Jew...Every individual Jew is going to have to make, should have to make a decision as to what he or she is committed. There is no one right answer. Religion is convenient. It's tradition and for the right wing it's dogmatic. But there are Jews who may choose to affiliate culturally or religiously. There are people I've met who hold onto the Yiddish language far more stringently than rabbis I know hold onto the Talmud. They have committed there. There is something that speaks to their soul. They have worked on finding a personal relationship between themselves and Judaism in a way that works for them.

"It's a very personal thing," he continued. "One of the problems in trying to institutionalize it educationally is that you can't institutionalize a personal decision. What you can institutionalize is access to information and data and experience and a nurturing environment that will encourage one to come to one's own conclusions. We're not going to define the one thing that makes one Jewish. If we try, we'll fail.

"Judaism is as individual as every individual Jew. The question is how open we can be, because there have to be limits also. That's a major problem. How far can one go?...There may be limits to what we're going to say is an acceptable commitment to Judaism. Within those limits [we should] be as inclusive as we can of all the Jews who want to be part of community in whatever way works for them."

Educator Michael Brown then made a pitch for adequate resources to enable community workers to do their work professionally.

Putting on her hat as director of an adult education centre that "has no stable source of funding," Rabbi Goldstein said "I can speak directly out of frustration. One thing I would hope our community could do is, 'think outside the box' when we think of funding."

Groups that normally "are not funded by the establishment and that were doing interesting, unusual kind of programming" were at one point assisted through a now defunct continuity program, Rabbi Goldstein said.

"I'd like us to really think outside of the box when we fund."

Rabbi Goldstein cited the example of a late friend who was trying to set up "a group on Jewish meditation just to talk about outside-the-box spirituality. Jews who felt very spiritual but not in a Jewish context were trying to get together to find a Jewish way to feel spiritual. Her battles to fund this one little event were extraordinary because it was an outside-of-the-box kind of Jewish event.

"So we have to get back to that. We have to ask what kind of other activities and programs and organizations should community money go to that is outside of what we understand to be the kind of framework that we use."

There is a "spiritual yearning" that goes beyond cultural and ethnic identification, among many Jews, she continued. "It is profound...There is a profound spiritual longing in people aged 20, 30 and their early 40s. I see it every day and they are really not looking for chicken soup answers. They are looking to answer the question, 'How can I connect to Torah...in an agenda-less way.'

"People are asking that question...My generation, young parents in their 40s and two generations before me are asking, 'What will it mean for our children to be spiritually Jewish, not just ethnically Jewish.' It's a really critical question for the future."

In other discussions, Barry Naiberg pointed out that Jewish youngsters in public schools "wanted to connect" to the wider Jewish community. Lyle Sugar, a student at CHAT, suggested that creation of programming aimed at youth "outside the community."

Ilan Barda, president of the Jewish Student Union, said there are few channels for youngsters in the public school system to connect to the wider community. In addition, high school graduates face "a [programming] void when they go away to university."

Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services, pointed out that public school students' "marginality begins at an early stage."

The great issues that once galvanized young people, such as working for Soviet Jews' freedom, are no longer there. It is now necessary to find new "points of connections" or "gateways" for the Jews on the margins.

Bringing in students and finding a niche for them, such as Jewish arts festival or a Jewish take on the environment, is "a slow, painstaking process," he said.

"We have to recognize that not everybody wants to be part of the mainstream. Not everyone wants to be involved with the kind of things we think they want to be involved with. That's one of the issues I have with the...organizations that set themselves up as saying 'We have the answer to everything.'

"We have to deal with people where they're at."

It's a long-term project with no firm answers, Kaye added.

Environment priority in Israel: JNF leader

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Yehiel Leket

TORONTO — It's not just blue pushkas or planting trees.

Today's Jewish National Fund (JNF) is on the front lines of Israel's burgeoning environmental movement, and continues to "reclaim" land in keeping with its century-old mandate, says the organization's world co-chair.

The JNF straddles a difficult line in Israel, says Yehiel Leket: working to keep Israel green but at the same time, developing land for settlement.

Leket, who took over JNF's rotating chairmanship last January, was in town for the annual Negev Dinner honoring Allan Silber. The event raised $5.8 million in cash and pledges.

He also met with JNF's Canadian board of director, and with the group's six shlichim across the country.

Leket, who was a Labor member of the Knesset 20 years ago, will assume JNF's world chairmanship in January 2000. The current chair, Shlomo Gravitz, who is affiliated with the Likud, will then become co-chair.

Known as Keren Kayemet Le'Yisrael back home, JNF is preparing to mark its 100th anniversary in 2001. It's come a long way since its founding as the primary tool to purchase land for Jewish settlement in Eretz Yisrael.

Following statehood, Leket says, JNF led the way in afforestation, development, hydrology and in the past decade or so, grappling with Israel's poor record on the environment.

The organization has planted 200 million trees in Israel since 1948, and continues to plant three million a year, both in new areas and in existing forests.

Today, 17 percent of Israel – and one-third of the country's central region – was purchased by JNF. Leket says most of the country's kibbutzim and moshavim are on JNF-developed land.

The organization is responsible for some 400,000 acres of Israeli forest and open spaces, the latter encompassing both desert and arable land.

It's also built over 100 water reservoirs over the past decade, and increased Israel's water capacity by five percent. Leket knows that the precious liquid is and will continue to be a flash point in Middle East politics.

But despite a string of solid accomplishments, JNF has, of late, clashed with environmental groups, which accuse it of being too soft.

At the same time, municipal and regional governments are being pressured with hundreds of plans for developing forests.

"JNF opposes development of forests and open spaces," says Leket. "But we still must develop land, pave roads and build infrastructures. It's a dilemma. We are trying to find the balance between development and ecology."

Green groups have charged the government and JNF with ignoring Israel's growing river pollution problem.

JNF is exploring a river rehabilitation program, which would make a serious attempt to clean up waterways of industrial and residential waste.

It's also been reforesting following a recent spate of forest fires, which destroyed or severely burned roughly 20,000 acres of trees.

In addition, the organization continued to build greenhouses in the Negev.

So not only is JNF busy, but a good part of its work goes unrecognized.

"In a competition for secrecy with the Mossad," jokes Leket, "we would win."

Teens require better education about AIDS: author

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Parents need to take a more proactive role in seeing that their children, especially the more sexually active ones, are getting adequate AIDS education, says the co-author of a report on sexual attitudes among Jewish youth.

Michael Dobbs, who co-conducted the study for UJA Federation in New York, said findings revealed that the vast majority of kids felt it was okay to have sex, even though at least half surveyed were somewhat worried about infection. About 90 percent questioned reported using some kind of protection.

"We are aware that the high figure may, in fact, represent a socially desirable answer – respondents telling those conducting the survey exactly what they wanted to hear," said Dobbs.

He was speaking at the third annual I. Jeffrey Presement Memorial Lecture presented under the joint auspices of the AIDS committees of Holy Blossom Temple, Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue and Adath Israel Congregation.

The study was conducted over a 15-month period, with 443 youth questioned from a variety of Jewish settings, including day schools, synagogues, camps and college campuses. Topics included knowledge of transmission and AIDS testing; attitudes about being tested for AIDS; vulnerability to the disease; using condoms; peer pressure; and asking a partner to use a condom.

While the results relate only to the United States, authors say that the findings have a broader impact – teens are not getting adequate AIDS education.

There is no cure for AIDS, said Dobbs, "so the only way to deal with it is through education. We must educate ourselves and others so we will have the skills to prevent AIDS."

Parents need to speak to the teenagers, he said, because teens need support from every part of their lives. "The family must be open [about these matters.]"

The Talmud says parents have three responsibilities toward their children, said Dobbs. "They must teach them the Torah, teach them a trade and teach them to swim. Teaching them a trade means educating them, so we have to make sure our children are educated."

Annette Goldstein, coordinator of outreach and education for the Theresa Group, a Toronto-based organization dedicated to serving children and families living with HIV/AIDS, said that medical advances have reduced the number of AIDS cases, but the number of infections has not decreased. "The Theresa Group has seen an increase in the number of people it has served."

For the Jewish family, she said, dealing with AIDS means not only dealing with the uncertainty of a disease, but dealing with how the family is treated in the community. "Families need to feel safe in schools and in community institutions. They need to be accepted and understood."

It is hard to determine the number of Jewish families affected by AIDS, she said, because "often the families will not speak out. I have met Jewish children who would not speak about their secret."

Struggling with the decision about disclosure is common among parents, Goldstein said. "Many families struggle in silence because they do not feel safe disclosing their secret."

AIDS is a disease that is out there, she said. "We are here to remind you that no community can afford to be complacent. We must educate ourselves with accurate information."

Salsberg Lane near

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — City council is expected to pass a resolution later this month naming a downtown lane after the late Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg.

A giant of Canadian Jewry, Salsberg died last February at the age of 95.

Councillors Joe Pantalone and Mario Silva, who represent Ward 20, proposed that a small, unnamed laneway at 604 Adelaide St. W. be named Joseph Salsberg Lane.

The lane is in a residential development and will have addresses on it.

The proposal is before the city's works department, and council will vote on it Dec. 16.

Silva and Pantalone told The CJN they expect no opposition.

"There's no question he was a colorful man," Silva said of J.B., who represented Toronto's old Ward 4 on city council in the early 1940s.

In fact, the district held by Silva and Pantalone contains a good part of Salsberg's old ward, which encompassed Spadina Avenue's many sweat shops.

Pantalone said he consulted members of Salsberg's family, and they approved.

Pantalone, a self-proclaimed social democrat, said Salsberg fought hard for immigrants' rights. Of Toronto's new 28 wards, Ward 20 has the highest percentage of non-English speakers, Pantalone noted.

J.B. Salsberg

"Mr. Salsberg had deep roots in this neighborhood and in Toronto," the councillors stated in a letter suggesting the naming, sent to the works department.

Other names which came up were Third Parish Lane, Cloister Mews and Garment Mews.

As the Communist MPP for St. Andrew's riding from 1943 to 1955, Salsberg became a driving force behind anti-discrimination legislation, Pantalone and Silva noted.

"He was a caring man regardless of his politics," Silva said.

A street sign could go up as early as January, Pantalone said.

Downtown day school expects enrolment jump

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Less than halfway through its initial year of operation, the Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS) is already planning an expansion to accommodate an expected surge in student enrolment next year.

DJDS administrators are preparing for a total enrolment next September of 50 children, a substantial increase from this year's tiny class of 10 youngsters, said Cynthia Lazar, president of the school's board.

Next year should see 20 children attending senior kindergarten, 20 in Grade 1 and a smaller class that combines grades 2 and 3.

Lazar, whose son Max is enrolled in this year's kindergarten program, believes the DJDS provides the children with a unique "cutting edge, warm, nurturing environment." Parents who took a wait-and-see attitude last year, are now clamoring to enrol their children, she said.

When the school was first proposed, 80 parents expressed interest in enrolling their children and 30 paid deposits. "But people were afraid. They felt they were risking their kids on the first year of a school. In my mind, they missed out. It's been fabulous," Lazar said.

A psychiatrist by profession, Lazar believes the DJDS has developed a successful formula to combine high educational standards with a unique model that provides "an integrated program."

Two teachers, Gaby Fridman and Brenda Enchin, provide near constant instruction and supervision, while combining the Judaic and secular portions of the program in an almost seamless web. During Rosh Hashanah, for example, children learned about apples (science), recipes (fractions) and bees (biology) in the context of a religious holiday, Lazar said. The program is designed to get the children thinking logically, she added.

Hebrew language, Judaism, the sacred texts and daily prayer are all part of the school day, but they are approached in an "egalitarian" manner, Lazar said.

Located on the second floor of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the school's main catchment area is the Annex, South Annex and Seaton Village areas of the downtown core. The school has even attracted a student from the Beaches. An estimated 15,000 Jews live south of St. Clair. Include the Beaches and Mississauga, and that number grows to 30,000.

Lazar believes the school is providing a unique service for the Jewish population downtown. "We're trying to attract families who'd never consider a day school education for their children," she said. "This is a group of unaffiliated Jews."

Pointing to demographic studies that show a 42 percent intermarriage rate for those living downtown, Lazar said "We have the potential to draw in people to this school who would be lost to Judaism."

Downtown day school seeking funding benefactors

The Bloor JCC provides a natural fit for the school, she continued. The nursery school in the premises can serve as a "feeder" for the day school while the school utilizes the centre's gym and swimming facilities. A seniors' group from the aquafit class even serves as volunteer supervisors for the kids in the pool, she added.

After school, some of the children remain on the premises, and mingle with dozens of other kids from three local schools in a day-care program housed in the centre.

During Chanukah, the Bloor JCC will host a Chanukah program that will attract 350 kids from the centre's supplementary school, the day school and from the surrounding community.

"The kids here enjoy being part of their community. That you wouldn't get anywhere else but in the JCC," Lazar said.

Tuition runs around $8,000 per student, a few hundred dollars more than at other Jewish day schools. The Bloor JCC is providing two classrooms and an office free of charge, helping to keep costs down.

The DJDS has received a $300,000 grant from the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), a U.S.-based philanthropic organization that includes Charles and Andrea Bronfman and Edgar Bronfman among its contributors. But the grant is conditional – the school must match each payment. It already submitted its first $75,000 cheque and is working to accumulate a second $75,000 by a January deadline. Volunteer fundraisers are approaching potential benefactors. "We're partway there," Lazar said.

Despite the financial crunch, the school has heady plans for the future. Lazar can foresee the day when it proves so popular it will require much more space on a third floor at the Bloor JCC.

And further in the future, "our dream would be to culminate with a trip to Israel in Grade 8," she said.

Kids enjoy recess at the Downtown Jewish Day School.

Son seeks Israel's recognition of father's post-war efforts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto man is trying to prove, so far without success, that his late father deserves an Israeli government award in recognition of his efforts to help Jewish refugees reach pre-state Israel after World War II.

Mark Adler claims that his father Abram, a Holocaust survivor who died in 1982 at the age of 53, led a large number of European Jews through the Austrian Alps to Palestine between 1945 and 1947.

Abram Adler, he says, was a member of the Brichah (Mossad Aliyah Bet), an organized underground operation which illegally moved upwards of 180,000 Holocaust survivors out of Europe to the British mandate in Palestine.

In honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, the Decorations Unit of the Ministry of Defence ran ads in Israeli newspapers urging individuals who had been active in Brichah to apply for the State of Israel Fighter's Award.

On behalf of his father, Adler applied for a posthumous medal. But much to his surprise and disappointment, the Decorations Unit has rejected the application.

"I feel this is wrong," he said. "I'm only asking for what he rightfully deserves."

About a year ago, Adler, 36, responded to an advertisement placed in the Jerusalem Post by the Decorations Unit. He had reason to believe that his father, a native of Lodz, Poland, who immigrated to Canada in December 1947, was eligible for the award.

Abram, who owned a shoe store after his arrival in Toronto, had occasionally told him about his exploits. And he possesses some 50 photographs of him in his Brichah uniform taken with other members of his unit.

Adler forwarded his application to Asher Ben Nathan, who was in charge of the Brichah operation in Austria, and who was later Israel's ambassador to Germany.

Ben Nathan, he says, informed him that there was no problem and that his father would receive a medal. But six months later, Ben Nathan backtracked, claiming that a medal would not be issued because neither he nor his friends in the Brichah could recall his father.

Stung by the rejection, Adler, the director of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, enlisted the support of Yehudi Kinar, Israel's consul general in Toronto, and Paul Michaels, the Canada-Israel Committee's director of communications.

Kinar sent the particulars of his tale to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem, while Michaels wrote Ben Nathan, who did not reply to his query.

Last December, Michaels contacted the Decorations Unit, but was told that Ben Nathan was unknown to them. Michaels then attempted to contact the director of the Decorations Unit, Mayer Golan, but he was unavailable.

Several months later, Adler received a letter from Golan in which he denied his bid for a medal.

Last May, frustrated by the bureaucratic nightmare in which he found himself, Adler dispatched a letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, outlining his case.

Adler ended the letter with this appeal: "You indicated in a public speech to mark Yom Hashoah that Israel has not done enough to remember those who made sacrifices for the creation of the state. My father was one of those young men who made this sacrifice by serving in the Brichah, and yet he is being denied."

In response, Adler received a letter on June 7 from Bobby Brown, Netanyahu's advisor for Diaspora affairs. Brown said that his father's eligibility for an award would be "carefully reviewed."

On July 29, in a subsequent letter to Adler, Brown wrote: "The name of Abram Adler did not appear on the list of Brichah activists, and none of the Brichah members in Austria remember your father. Furthermore, the uniform which your father was wearing in the photograph you sent Mr. Ben Nathan was not identified as that of the Brichah.

"In light of the inability to prove your father's participation in the Brichah enterprise, we are unable to grant him the Fighter's Award."

Undeterred, Adler went to Israel in August, where he met with David Bar-Ilan, Netanyahu's communications advisor. From Bar-Ilan, Adler heard that the Prime Minister's Office was not responsible for such matters.

In a meeting with Brown, Adler showed him photographs of his father in the company of Brichah operatives. Brown, however, said that the photos did not conclusively prove anything, and that he should produce a person or persons who personally worked with Abram in the Brichah.

In an interview last week, Adler said that he knows no such person, and relies on his father's integrity that he, in fact, belonged to the Brichah.

Adler pointed out that the Hebrew University historian, Yehuda Bauer, an authority on the Brichah who has written a book on the subject, told him that Brichah had never compiled a list of its members in Austria.

Adler said that he intends to pursue the matter until his father's deeds are officially recognized and he receives a State of Israel Fighter's Award.

Both Michaels and Kinar are convinced that Adler has a compelling case.

Reached in Vancouver, where he was travelling, Kinar said, "His story sounds plausible."

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace. And, we've set the fall of 1999 for its opening.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed early in the new year. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

Dairy dishes also a part of Chanukah tradition

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

While most Jews (you know the joke, two Jews, three opinions) agrees that latkes and soufganiot are the most popular Chanukah foods, a less well known, yet no less popular Chanukah tradition is to serve cheeses and other dairy dishes. The serving of these foods is in honor of Judith whose story is found in the Apocrypha. Judith invited an enemy general (one who was planning on destroying her town) to dinner. She fed him huge amounts of cheese and wine and after he fell over in a drunken stupor she beheaded him. His soldiers fled in terror and the town was saved. It's said that it was Judith's bravery that inspired the Maccabees.

DRUNKEN APPLE LATKES

2 cups biscuit mix
1 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup golden raisins
½ cup cider or apple juice
¼ cup milk
3 tbsp. apple liquor
2 eggs
Oil for frying
1 red apple, unpeeled, cored and sliced in wafer-thin wedges
Cinnamon sugar to sprinkle

In a bowl, combine biscuit mix, sugar, cinnamon and raisins. Make a well in the centre and add cider or apple juice, milk, apple liquor and eggs.

Stir to mix. Heat about ⅛ inch oil in a large skillet over medium heat until a drop of the mixture sizzles. Drop about 2 tablespoons of the apple mixture for each latke into hot oil. Place 2 to 3 apple wedges on top. Press down to flatten slightly with the back of a wooden spoon. Fry over medium heat for 2 to 3 minutes longer until the second side is nicely browned. Serve hot, sprinkled with cinnamon sugar. Makes 10 to 12.

POTATO CHEESE LATKE

4 cups peeled, grated potatoes (See directions)
1 medium onion, finely chopped, about cup (See directions)
4 finely chopped cloves garlic
1 tbsp. finely chopped cilantro leaves
1 cup ricotta cheese (nonfat or low-fat is fine)
½ cup grated carrot
1 tsp. cumin or more, to taste
1 tsp. salt
Freshly ground pepper to taste
2 lightly beaten eggs
½ cup matzo meal or breadcrumbs
8 to 10 tbsp. oil

In a food processor or by hand grate the potatoes along with the onions. Place the grated vegetables in a colander set over a bowl. Let the vegetables drain until they no longer squish when you press down. Pour the liquid out of the bowl, taking care not to pour out the potato starch which has accumulated at the bottom of the bowl. Scoop out the starch and add back to the grated vegetable shreds.

Mix all ingredients in a bowl. Heat a large skillet and place 2 to 3 tablespoons of oil in it. Use about ½ cup of batter for each pancake and use a spatula to flatten the batter to about ½ inch thick. Fry until well browned, then flip pancake and brown other side. Add additional oil for additional pancakes.

This batter should make about 16 pancakes. The cooked ones can be kept warm on a baking sheet in a 300 degree oven until all pancakes are ready.

SOUFGANIOT WITH APPLES

¼ cup milk
½ cup sugar
¼ cup oil
2 eggs
3 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
2½ cups flour
½ cup raisins or chopped apples
¼ cup sugar mixed with ½ teaspoon cinnamon

Cookbook recipes delicious — even if they're healthy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A lot can happen in ten years. Just ask Rosie Schwartz. Macmillan Canada has just published the tenth anniversary edition of her popular cookbook The Enlightened Eater - and there are a whole lot of changes.

When the book first came out, she told The CJN, the focus was on what you shouldn't eat. "Now, we focus on what we should eat, such as grains, fruits, vegetables, and low fat, rather than no-fat foods."

As well, Schwartz said, the emphasis is on "being healthy and feeling well," rather than just on maintaining a healthy weight.

She said that we are just beginning to understand how proper eating can prevent diseases. For instance, she said, in Japan, the health danger is not heart disease, as it is in North America, but stroke, because of the high sodium diet.

Awareness, and a desire to change one's lifestyle, is the first step in changing behavior around food, she said. "You can't maintain extremes of behavior." Rather, she said, concentrate on learning to adapt food to individual preferences, and on cutting down, rather than on cutting favorite foods out entirely.

Other advice from Schwartz includes that eating five servings of fruit and vegetables every day (especially food like tomatoes and broccoli) will lower your blood pressure, and having a proper breakfast.

There is more awareness now that for the elderly "the ability to be mobile and active, and to fight disease depends on proper nutrition within a diet lower in calories," she explained.

The Enlightened Eater is much more than a recipe book. There is extensive discussion of food categories, nutrition, weight loss and gain, ways to keep the goodness and nutritional value in food, and physiology. The detailed recipe and subject indexes allow the reader to choose a dish, and then go back to the article about it, so as to get a better perspective.

Schwartz also discusses common beliefs and food fads. For instance, she noted, it has been discovered that garlic has many medicinal benefits, like lowering the risk of breast and stomach cancer, regulating blood pressure, decreasing blood pressure, lowering cholesterol and fighting infection. However, these benefits only come from eating garlic, not from garlic pills.

Lest it appear that The Enlightened Eater is a textbook, it is also a font of delicious recipes – even if they are healthy.

MANGO SORBET
Serves 6
(Almost any soft-fleshed fruit works well in this ice, which is high in vitamins, minerals, and fibre.)

3/4 cup granulated sugar
3/4 cup water
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. orange or peach liqueur (opt.)
3 cups mango puree, from about 3 large mangoes*

Combine sugar and water in a small saucepan. Bring to a boil, stirring, and boil for 2 minutes. Cool, then transfer to a medium sized stainless-steel bowl or metal pan. Stir in the remaining ingredients and mix well. Cover with plastic wrap and freeze until firm.

Remove sorbet from freezer. Place in a food processor or blender and process until the mixture is slushy but firm. Return to the freezer until needed. To serve, remove from the freezer about 15 min. before serving time.

*To puree the mangoes, peel, cut away the flesh from the stone, then process in a food processor or blender until smooth.

Pepper's versatility a happy discovery in veggie-land

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Every so often, I decide that I want to be a vegetarian. Not a "give up eggs and butter and anything that even remotely resembles meat" kind of vegetarian, but rather, a "just eliminate meat for a while" vegetarian. The feeling only lasts a day or two, but it's usually during that time frame that I discover some really great recipes.

During my last foray into the land of vegetables, I fell in love with peppers. I think that they are one of the most versatile vegetables available today. In one dish they're red and sweet, the next they're spicy and savory, and the next they're three-alarm hot.

GARBANZO AND ROASTED RED PEPPER DIP

16 oz. can garbanzo beans (chick-peas), rinsed and drained
7 oz. roasted red peppers, rinsed and drained
1/3 cup yogurt
1 small clove garlic, chopped
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper

Process all of the ingredients in a food processor or blender and process until smooth. Refrigerate for at least 1 hour before serving. Makes 2 cups.

MEDITERRANEAN PEPPERS AND POTATOES

2 tsp. olive oil
1/2 cup chopped onion
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 cup minced seeded plum tomatoes
2 cups cubed peeled baking potatoes
1 cup red bell pepper, 1-inch pieces
1 cup yellow bell pepper, 1-inch pieces
1 cup orange bell pepper, 1-inch pieces
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
10 1/2 ounces low-salt chicken broth
1/4 cup coarsely chopped fresh basil
1/4 cup sliced pimento-stuffed olives

SWEET POTATO KUGEL WITH RED PEPPERS

4 large (2 lb) sweet potatoes, peeled
1 medium onion, quartered
1/2 to 3/4 cup parsley sprigs
1 large red bell pepper, cored and diced in 1/2-inch pieces
1/2 cup ground almonds
1/4 cup chicken or vegetable broth
2 eggs
2 egg whites
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. white pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 2 1/2-quart baking dish with non-stick vegetable spray. Cut sweet potatoes into 2-inch chunks. Place in food processor with onion, and chop coarsely (may need to be done in two batches). Add parsley, and process to chop sweet potatoes finely. Spoon into a large bowl.

Add red bell pepper, almonds, broth, eggs and egg whites, 1 tbsp., salt and pepper. Mix thoroughly. Spoon into prepared baking dish. Drizzle remaining oil over. Cover lightly with foil. Bake in preheated oven 1 1/4 hours, removing foil last 15 minutes. Kugel should be nicely browned and vegetables tender.

To make in advance: Place a layer of wax paper on surface, then cover tightly with foil. Freeze. Transfer to refrigerator 24 hours before needed. Remove wax paper, cover again with foil and place in preheated 350 oven for 40 minutes or until heated through.

ROASTED RED PEPPER SOUP WITH ELEPHANT GARLIC AND BASIL

4-5 red bell peppers
3 cloves elephant garlic
1 cup tomato sauce
1/3 cup puree (from first paragraph of recipe)
2 cups chicken stock (or vegetable stock)
1 tbsp. honey
Lemon pepper
5-6 fresh basil leaves

Blacken the red peppers under broiler until the skins are charred and shriveled. Bake the elephant garlic at 350, leaving the skins on until garlic is soft, and skins are quite dark but not burned (15 to 20 minutes). Remove peppers & garlic from oven and place them in a paper bag, fold over the top and leave them in there for about 15 minutes until skins peel off both the peppers and garlic. Puree peppers

1/2 cup finely grated Parmesan cheese

Melt margarine in medium-sized saucepan. Add onion and garlic and cook over medium heat until soft. Stir in the flour and cook, stirring, for about 1 minute. Whisk in the milk, stirring until the sauce is smooth and thickened. Season with cayenne, nutmeg, salt and pepper. Stir in the cheese and cook until it melts.

Place half the macaroni in a medium-sized ovenproof dish. Top with a layer of spinach. Spoon half the sauce over the spinach. Top with the remaining macaroni and sauce. Sprinkle with Parmesan. Bake at 350 for about 20 minutes, or until golden brown.

Heat oil in a medium saucepan over medium-high heat. Add onion; saute 10 minutes. Add garlic, and saute 1 minute. Add the tomato, and cook 5 minutes, stirring frequently. Add potato, bell peppers, salt, black pepper, and broth; bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat, and simmer 20 minutes or until potato is tender, stirring occasionally. Remove from heat; stir in basil and olives. Let stand, covered, 20 minutes and serve. Serves 8.

and garlic in food processor until thick but not chunky. Toss in basil leaves and puree.

Transfer puree to a pot, add honey, tomato sauce, chicken or vegetable stock. Simmer till heated through, add lemon pepper to season, and adjust to taste.

RED PEPPER LATKES

2 roasted red bell peppers
½ cup fresh or frozen corn kernels
1 shallot, finely chopped
Olive oil
2 tbsp. butter
Salt
Freshly ground black pepper
1 cup whipping cream
1½ cups flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 cup milk
3 eggs, separated
2 tbsp. minced chives
8 sprigs cilantro, leaves only

Chop 1 bell pepper into small dice. Set aside. Cut remaining bell pepper in half. Cut 1 half into very thin strips. Mince other half almost to consistency of puree, and set aside. Saute corn, diced bell pepper, bell pepper strips and shallot in 1 tablespoon olive oil and butter for 2 minutes. Season with salt and pepper to taste and stir in whipping cream. Simmer over medium-low heat 15 minutes. Set aside.

Sift flour, baking powder and 1 tsp. salt into bowl. Stir in milk and egg yolks. Beat egg whites until they form soft peaks, then fold them into the egg yolk mixture. Fold in reserved minced peppers. Lightly brush skillet with olive oil and heat over medium heat until drop of water sizzles. Spoon or pour 3-inch latkes into skillet and cook over medium heat, 2 to 3 minutes per side.

To serve, place warm pepper-and-corn sauce on each plate and top with 2 latkes. Garnish with chives and cilantro.

Scones can be an eclectic treat

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Every now and then I get tired of cookies (hard to believe, I know, but it happens). It's at this point that I turn to one of my favorite alternatives, scones. Quintessentially English, the origin of the word scone is debatable. Some say it comes from the Dutch word schoonbrot (beautiful bread) and others say it comes from Stone (Scone) of Destiny, where the kings of Scotland were crowned. Originally triangular-shaped with a soft inside, they were cut in half and served warm with butter and jam or lemon curd.

Scones are usually dairy, and while not the first (or second or third) thing you think of when the word kosher desserts come up, they can be made pareve. They are, however, best when made using milk, cream, buttermilk, sour cream, or yogurt. They can also be very eclectic. Raisins, dried or fresh fruit, chocolate, herbs, cheese and vegetables in any combination are just a few of the ingredients you can add to your scones. Using different flours (both white and whole wheat), cornmeal and oatmeal can also create endless combinations.

Scones are not difficult to make. The most important thing to remember is to handle the dough as little as possible. Don't use an electric mixer because overworking the dough can cause a heavy, dense and tough scone. Try not to use too much flour when rolling them out and they freeze really well.

CRANBERRY SCONE

¾ cup buttermilk or plain yogurt
1 large egg
3 cup flour
4 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
1 stick cold, unsalted butter, cut up
1 cup fresh or frozen cranberries
½ cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. grated orange peel
1 tbsp. butter at room temperature

Heat oven to 375°. Measure buttermilk in 2 cup glass measure, beat in egg with fork. Put flour, baking powder, soda and salt into a large bowl. Stir to mix well. Add 8 tablespoons butter and cut in with a pastry blender or rub in with your fingers, till mixture looks like fine granules. Add the cranberries, sugar,

Bake 20 to 25 minutes or until medium brown. Remove to wire rack. Brush with the 1 tablespoon of soft butter. Let cool, uncovered, at least 1 hour before serving. Serve with jams, jellies and/or plain or lemon yogurt. Makes 8 scones.

½ cup dried sour cherries (available at specialty foods shops) granulated sugar for sprinkling

Preheat oven to 400. In a bowl whisk together ½ cup of the buttermilk, the egg, the brown sugar, and the vanilla until the mixture is combined; set it aside. In another bowl stir together the flour, the baking powder, the baking soda, and the salt and blend in the butter until the mixture resembles coarse meal. Stir in the cherries and the buttermilk mixture with a fork until the mixture just forms a sticky but manageable dough. Knead the dough gently for 30 seconds on a lightly floured surface, pat it into a ¾-inch-thick round, and cut it into 8 wedges. On an ungreased baking sheet brush the wedges with the remaining ¼ cup buttermilk and sprinkle them with the granulated sugar. Bake the scones in the middle of the preheated oven for 15 to 18 minutes, or until they are golden. Makes 8 scones.

LEMON CREAM SCONES

2 cups all purpose flour
¼ cup plus 2 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
¾ cup chopped dried apricots (about 4½ ounces)
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. grated lemon peel
1¼ cups whipping cream
3 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted

Preheat oven to 425. Mix 2 cups flour, ¼ cup sugar, 1 tablespoon baking powder and ½ tsp. salt in large bowl. Stir in apricots and 1 tablespoon lemon peel. Add whipping cream and stir just until dough forms. Turn dough out onto lightly floured surface. Knead gently just until dough holds together. Form dough into 10-inch-diameter, ½-inch-thick round. Cut into 12 wedges.

Transfer wedges to large baking sheet, spacing evenly. Combine remaining 2 tbsp. sugar and 1 tsp. lemon peel in small bowl. Brush scones with melted butter. Sprinkle with sugar mixture. Bake scones until light golden brown, about 15 minutes. Transfer to rack and cool slightly. (Can be prepared one day ahead. Cool completely. Wrap in foil; store at room temperature.) Serve scones warm or at room temperature. Makes 12.

In large bowl on low speed, mix milk, sugar, oil, eggs, baking powder, salt and 1 cup of the flour. Scrape bowl constantly and mix only about 30 seconds until combined. Increase speed to medium and continue mixing for 2 minutes scraping bowl as needed. Stir in remaining flour and fruit. In a high sided fryer heat 2 to 3 inches of oil. Drop batter by teaspoons full into hot oil. As the soufganiot rise turn them. Fry for about 2 minutes on each side or until golden brown. Remove and drain on paper towels or brown bags. (These are best if available.) Roll the puffs in sugar mixture before serving.

Community Matters

UJA Campaign Heads for the Finish

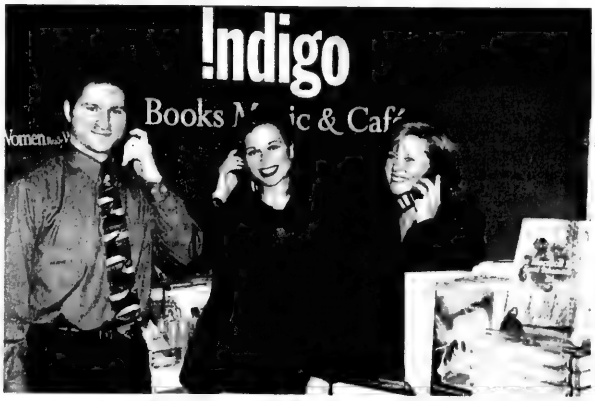
UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty is racing to the finish line next week, with hundreds of campaigners making calls to contributors from their homes, offices and even their cars.

It's the final lap of what is being touted as UJA Federation's most successful fundraising drive ever. The Campaign for Fifty, with a $50 million annual fundraising goal, officially closes on December 14, but donors who have yet to be reached will still be contacted.

Momentum has been growing in recent months. October and November telethons raised close to $1.5 million and campaign pledges have grown an average 20% from last year.

The final series of Dare to Dream telethons, currently being held throughout the city, include venues such as Indigo Books Music & Cafe at the Yonge and Eglington location.

Fashion Division campaigner Paul Silvertown, who went as far as calling a supporter during one of his business flights, has been keeping in touch with dozens of donors from his office at Incredible Clothing Company during his free time. "I find that many contributors are willing to give their time as well as their money to a worthy cause."



(l-r) Ephram Spiegelman, Marketing Manager, Indigo Books Music & Cafe, Riki Lichtman, UJA Federation volunteer and Janet Pickell, Marketing Consultant, Bell Mobility, which donated phone rental and air time during December 6 - 10 telethons.

"The Campaign for Fifty has been such a great success because people are willing to go the extra mile when they see the need," says Howard Lichtman, who is co-chairing the current Dare to Dream telethons with his wife Riki, Tammy Anklewicz, Sharon Perlmutter and Miriam Rosenberg.

"The overall response has been very positive," notes Stephen Goldhar, who co-chairs UJA Federation's Developers Campaign with Zelic Altman. "I believe many of our new donors will remain committed," adds Goldhar.

The Campaign for Fifty, led by Larry Tanenbaum and Brent Belzberg, along with Vice Chairs Dr. Howard Price, Glennie Lindenberg and Abe Glowinsky, will allocate increased contributions to programs that strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews around the world.

If you would like to help UJA Federation reach its goal, you can call in your pledge by dialing (416) 631-5705 or by mail to UJA Federation, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, Ontario, M2R 3V2.

The families of Cory Sterling (L) and Jesse Glowinsky have one more reason to be proud of their sons, who recently celebrated their bar mitzvahs. The two grade 8 Leo Baeck students raised more than $2,000 for UJA Federation, by inviting their school chums to make charitable donations in their honour in lieu of gifts. Cory and Jesse learned about the importance of tzedakah from their parents Carole and Jay Sterling and Abe and Janice Glowinsky. Some of the funds will be used for summer camp scholarships for needy children.

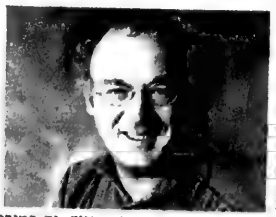
שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים



שישאר בינינו - קשה לקרוא את זה:

בשבועות האחרונים יתכן שאתם מתקשים לקרוא את "שישאר בינינו". לא, הראיה שלכם לא השתנתה וקהרב לודאי שהמשקפיים שלכם עדיין בפוקוס. אבל מה - הנייר משום מה לא סובל את מה שכתוב והיצירות האלמותיות שאני מפיק יוצאות בדפוס דהה ובלתי ברור. זה בעיקר מתסכל, כי שאר הדף, באנגלית, נראה דווקא טוב מאוד. זה כמובן קשור לכך שאת הדף שלנו אנחנו מכינים בעברית וצריך לצלם אותו בתהליך ההפקה. הגשנו תלונה. נקווה לטוב. העיקר להיות חיוביים.

אפילוג הטיסה לארץ:

הקייטנה של קנלר:

זהו ספר סיפורים חדש של אתגר קרת, סופר צעיר שעומד בחוד החנית של דור חדש של כותבים בעברית. קראתי את ספריו הקודמים ונדלקתי! זהו. אם אינני טועה, ספרו הראשון שמגיע לראש רשימת רבי המכר, וזה סימן טוב. הספר עצמו קטן וצנום. סך הכל מאה עמודים באותיות יחסית גדולות ודפים פצפונים אבל מה - קמות ואיכות לא חד הוא. הכתיבה עצמה, ברמה החיצונית שלה היא "זרוקה" - זוהי ארץ ישראל חדשה, ציונית, מצחיקה. מתחת למעטה הזה-הסיפורים נגעו ללבי מאוד. הספר וסופר הם מאוד "תל-אביביים". עם כל הטוב והרע שבזה. היזה, כדי לתת לכם לטעום.

"בכל מה שנוגע לכעיה של מירון, הדעות, כמו שאומרים, חלוקות. הרופאים חושבים שזה איזה טראומה מתקופת הצבא שעלתה לו פתאום מחדש למוח, כמו גוש שצף לך פתאום באסלה הרבה אחרי שהורדת את המים. ההורים שלו מתעקשים שזה הכל מפטריות שבלע במזרח ושהפכו לו את המוח לקיש".

("הקייטנה של נמרוד", מתוך "הקייטנה של קנלר", בהוצאת כתר, 1998)

סיפור שמח עם התחלה עצובה:

כמה שהחיים מוזרים! עד לפני מספר ימים לא ידעתי מי היא לינור אברגיל בת התשע עשרה. יום אחד אני פותח את העיתון הקנדי המכובד ורואה תמונה שלה בעמוד החדשות ומספרים לי שהיא ייצגה את ישראל וזכתה ב"מיס תבל". נדמה לי שעבר בדיוק דור מאז שישראלית זכתה בתואר מלכת היופי העולמית. יופי, אני אומר לעצמי, נעים לקרוא הודעה כזו אחרי שבועות של פיגועים והרוגים ומה לא. לא עוברים יומיים ואותו עיתון מגלה לי שלפני כחודש, בשהותה באיטליה בתצוגת אופנה, נאנשה לינור באכזריות על ידי בעל סוכנות נסיעות מצרי שהציע לה טרמפ לרומא. היא התלוננה במשטרה והאיש נעצר ויישפט. חשבתי לי- איזו מסכנה! להתכונן לתחרות של חייה אחרי אונס אכזרי בארץ זרה, ועוד לוכות! זה מראה שהיא חזקה ומיוחדת. רק מה - אם לא יטפלו בזה כראוי עכשיו, השילוב של הפרסום העצום, פלוס הטראומה, פלוס הפרסום על הטראומה עלול להרוס אותה. אני מתפלל בשבילה שהיא מוקפת באנשים שאוהבים אותה ושיעשו את הדברים הנכוניםבשבילה, ולא רק כאלה שרוצים פרסום וכסף. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

Students' adviser was outgoing, vibrant

Obituary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

HAMILTON — Sheila Freedman, longtime adviser of the Jewish Students Association (JSA) at McMaster University, died in late October of cancer. She was 55.

"She was a wonderful, wonderful director," said Judy Schwartz, who was hired as JSA director in September. "She loved those students, and they loved her."

Freedman, a native of Toronto, attended Bathurst Heights Secondary School before entering teacher's college. Her father, Hy Kirsh, was an ordained rabbi who had immigrated from Poland.

Before moving to Hamilton with her husband Mel in 1972, Freedman taught Grade 1 at Fairmeadow Public School.

In Hamilton, she taught religious school at Temple Anshe Shalom, and later at Beth Jacob Congregation for 12 years, until last December. She was also active in Beth Jacob's sisterhood, and on one occasion gave the Sisterhood Shabbat sermon.

Her son Mark recalls tagging along to campus activities when he and his sister were younger. "It always used to surprise me to see how cool she was with [the students]," he said. "She was less like a mother than an older friend. They used to seek her out for personal advice."

A decade ago, Freedman began taking courses at McMaster toward a BA in Religious Studies. She was one course short of attaining that goal when she died, her husband told The CJN. The degree will be granted posthumously at spring convocation.

"She was a vibrant, outgoing individual, interested in other people," recalled her husband. "She was an excellent teacher and had a real rapport with the university students."

The JSA lounge is to be rededicated in Freedman's memory, and JSA students are setting up a fund in Freedman's name to benefit students, said Schwartz.

In addition to her husband Mel and children Amy and Mark, Freedman is survived by her brother Gerald Kirsh and mother Sylvia Kirsh.

Campus group, JVS launch career mentoring program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is launching a career mentoring program in partnership with Jewish Vocational Services (JVS).

The program, called Career Connections, will match graduating and recently graduated university students with professionals working in their respective areas of interest.

The idea came about through a focus group conducted last summer by JCS, said Jason Soloway, JCS program associate. "We recognized a need to reach out to a growing number of students who have an idea where they want to go professionally, but don't know the tangible steps to get there."

Once the program gets under way – by the beginning of January, organizers project – Soloway hopes to have 35 students and 35 mentors as participants. Mentors will be sought by JVS after selected students indicate their areas of interest.

After an introductory meeting, it is expected that matched participants will meet one hour a month for six months, or more often if they like.

Mentors might offer information, emotional support and ideas, said Barbara Fish, a career counsellor at JVS.

Concrete suggestions such as the types of people the student can contact, as well as how to build a resume appropriate for that field would also be helpful, said Soloway.

Students will make contacts that could lead them to jobs that enhance their careers, he said.

So what's in it for the mentors? "I think that people generally get a good feeling from being helpful to others," said Fish, noting that often people want to mentor others as a type of repayment for having been mentored themselves.

The experience can also provide an opportunity for them to reconnect with people in their field, and they may even pick up new ideas or techniques from the students, she added.

Pearl Gropper Berman, assistant executive director of JCS, sees the project, which is funded by UJA Federation, as a bridge between the students and the Jewish community.

"I think it's important that the students know the community's there for them, that Jewish Campus Services is offering more than just social programs and that Jewish Vocational Services is accessible for them," she said.

CJC backs hate law proposals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is applauding a series of proposals that would toughen Canada's anti-hate legislation.

The proposals, advanced by a working group representing federal and provincial attorneys general, would remove denial of the Holocaust as a potential "truth" defence to a charge of promoting hate. The proposed reforms would also make it a crime to possess hate propaganda for the purposes of distributing it and would create a new crime for the desecration of houses of worship and cemeteries. Other proposed changes would allow for the seizure of computer hard drives that stored hate propaganda and for the expansion of the groups protected from hate propaganda.

"I have received support from the federal and provincial attorneys general to expand the groups protected from hate propaganda and to update the Criminal Code to address hate crime," British Columbia Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh stated in a news release.

"In supporting this package, the justice ministers showed great sensitivity to the concerns of vulnerable minorities in our society," commented Mark Weintraub, chair of Congress' national community relations committee. "They also understood the need to upgrade the Criminal Code to make our laws more reflective of the demographic reality in Canada," he said.

Congress President Moshe Ronen said "identifying the Holocaust as an historically recognized act of genocide in law will send a critical message that Holocaust denial is unacceptable in Canada."

Elissa Lieff, senior counsel in the criminal law policy section of the Department of Justice, declined to comment on the reported recommendations. She said federal Justice Department lawyers will study the proposals to determine whether it violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and would forward their findings to the minister.

The proposals may eventually be introduced to parliament in the form of a bill, she added.

Students pitch in

By MYRON LOVE

WINNIPEG — The students at the Gray Academy of Jewish Education have joined the international efforts to aid the victims of Hurricane Mitch, which devastated Central America last month.

The 750 students raised over $800 with a creative fundraising campaign they conducted in mid-November in the heart of the Asper Jewish Community Campus, of which the Gray Academy is a component. The money was given to the Canadian Red Cross.

The students stretched a 23.5-metre-long roll of tape the length of the Asper Centre's "Main Street," and students and visitors attached $1 and $2 coins, quarters and dimes. A kindergarten class contributed $30. Many students gave their lunch money.

"We are encouraged to do chesed in the Jewish community," says Sheera Cipilinski, the Grade 12 student council member who initiated the fundraising campaign. "I felt that the school should get involved in other things that are going on in the world. I am pleased that this worked out so well."

Leona Lakser, principal of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the high school portion of the Gray Academy, says she is proud of her students. "The response was beyond our expectations."

Complaints against refugee board dismissed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An investigation dismissing the complaints of a former member of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has the complainant seeing red.

In September, Maureen Silcoff, who served on the IRB for five years until early 1998, filed complaints against three members, as well as the deputy chair, for inappropriate and unprofessional behavior.

In one, she complained about a member making anti-Semitic and homophobic comments.

But in a 22-page report released last Friday, Prof. Ed Ratushny, a University of Ottawa law professor charged with probing the matter, dismissed all of Silcoff's complaints, saying they "are without merit."

Ratushny said he found no evidence to establish Silcoff's allegations of improper conduct on the part of IRB members.

He rejected outright her allegations against two members, and did not address the charges against Lubomyr Luciuk, the member who supposedly had made anti-Semitic remarks because, as of Nov. 4, Luciuk was not re-appointed to the board.

Ratushny said the board has no legal jurisdiction to deal with complaints about former members' conduct.

And he noted that the complaint against the deputy chair, John Frecker, for allegedly interfering with a case, had already been dismissed by legal counsel.

Silcoff, now a lawyer in private practice, told The CJN she is "hugely disappointed" by the findings, and said she would write to IRB chair Nurjehan Mawani to correct what she called "unfair" and "inaccurate" aspects of Ratushny's report.

"It basically says I'm lying. I don't see what possible ill motives they can ascribe to me."

Silcoff said the report spends too much time assessing her own credibility. She said it might discourage other current and former IRB members from launching grievances.

Silcoff said the time it took to produce the report meant Ratushny did not have to deal with Luciuk.

Ratushny's report came two months after another probe cleared Frecker for allegedly uttering the words, "sieg heil," accompanied by some form of salute.

Last week, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) renewed its calls for an open, independent probe of bias, homophobia and anti-Semitism at the IRB.

CJC president Moshe Ronen said Congress would take the matter up with the federal ministries of justice and immigration.

Quebec Jews feel relief

and that's the single most important thing for the community."

The prospect of another four years of PQ government doesn't bother Plotnick. "In terms of management, they've done a good job, and as far as the Jewish community is concerned, they've always been responsive."

He's not concerned federalists are being lulled into a false sense of security.

"People are so tired, that any sign that they can let down their guard a moment is welcome. If and when any crises arise, we'll deal with them."

Plotnick has a personal stake in Quebec's future. He's the prime mover behind the Jewish community campus project. During the campaign, he announced it was expanding from a $23 to a $30-million project.

David Shapiro, co-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) political action committee, was also encouraged by the better than expected results, but more restrained.

"It's a reprieve and that's important. We've bought some time, and time is on the side of the federalists," he said, adding, "But it's not the end of the [national unity] question."

Shapiro is struck by the calm in the Jewish community. "The community has evolved in such a way that it doesn't panic when the PQ is elected. They don't see it a crisis like they used to. That's healthy."

If there is any exodus, it will be because the PQ cannot improve the economy, not because of fear of separation, said Shapiro, 37, a lawyer for Air Canada, who returned to Quebec after earning degrees in Ontario and the United States.

Two national unity activists, Aaron Makovka, co-founder of Team Canada for Unity, and Gary Shapiro, chair of the Quebec Committee for Canada, take somewhat different views.

Makovka, 27, is convinced the vast majority of Quebecers don't want a referendum and the PQ could never hold one under those conditions. "The community should be confident and hang tight. Bouchard is not so sure of himself anymore. In four years, Charest's time will come. The outlook is great," he said.

Shapiro, however, warns that, "until separatism is officially dead, the threat still hangs over our economy. The fact is the smart money is still not coming here.

"The PQ's platform continues to call for separation, and while that's there, we will always be looking over our shoulder. Ideally, we would have the referendum tomorrow and put the uncertainty to bed."

Among Sephardim, the election result was not grabbing as much attention as was a CBC TV report. Although the estimate was not attributed, CBC said that 10 percent of the over 20,000-member Sephardi community would likely vote PQ.

Elie Benchetrit, community relations director for the Communauté Sépharade du Québec, said, "It's misleading. I don't know where they got it."

Benchetrit said, being very generous, he would put it at five percent. "Among the people I know, 99 percent were voting Liberal."

The report has caused some ill feeling among Ashkenazim. "Some are blaming Sephardim for the Liberals not winning," he said.

In 1994, two Sephardim, Armand Elbaz and Salomon Cohen, vied for the PQ nomination in Outremont, with Cohen eventually running. At least one former ardent Pequiste, Gila Benesty-Sroka, editor of La Tribune Juive, has become disaffected. She's dropped her membership and didn't even bother to vote. "It's boring," she says of Quebec politics. She is not aware of any other Jews in the party today.

Referendum concerns

Friend Yvette Hazan could not have disagreed more vehemently.

Hazan, 39, the mother of twin girls, said several times that she was very, very, disappointed by the election results and was certain that Bouchard would look for a pretext to hold a referendum at the expense of issues that really matter to voters.

"A referendum? I hope not, but that's his only goal, and they're going to fight to have one. It's awful."

Miriam Spilberg, 78, wanted the Liberals to win, but was assuaged by the Liberals' slim plurality in the popular vote.

"Of course I was relieved," she said.

Spilberg has one child in Montreal, but two left for Toronto 15 years ago, and she was among those who hoped and did not think there would be a referendum during the PQ's term in office.

On the other hand, she also said she had predicted a Liberal victory.

Dave Klein, like everyone The CJN spoke to, also expected the PQ to win, but was relieved that the Liberals were able to pull ahead in the popular vote by the time all the votes were counted.

Because of that, Klein said, Bouchard might hold a referendum, "but he'll be scared to do it. A lot of francophones, even those who voted PQ, do not want a referendum. They don't want separation."

Klein also was glad to see Jean Charest as leader of the Opposition, since Charest was someone he felt had the potential to respond to Bouchard articulately and with rhetorical skills of his own in the National Assembly.

Mideast tensions rising before Clinton visit

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has blamed Palestinian officials for encouraging violent protests in the West Bank.

Netanyahu made the accusation amid a series of demonstrations that led to clashes between Israeli troops and the protesters, who are demanding the release of Palestinian activists being held in Israeli jails. Some 20 Palestinians were wounded in the weekend clashes.

The latest argument between Israel and the Palestinian Authority comes as U.S. President Bill Clinton is slated to visit the region next week.

Netanyahu said at Sunday's weekly Cabinet meeting that Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat must take clear steps to "stop the incitement and violence" in the West Bank. He added that Israel could not consider handing over additional West Bank territory to the Palestinians given the current atmosphere of violence over the prisoner releases.

Last month, Israel freed 250 Palestinian prisoners as part of the Wye agreement.

After releasing the prisoners, Israeli leaders said no prisoners with blood on their hands would be freed.

But Palestinian officials, noting that many of those freed were common criminals, have demanded the freedom of security prisoners – those jailed for anti-Israel activities.

Meanwhile, hundreds of Palestinian prisoners joined a hunger strike Sunday to demand their freedom.

Last week, Israel's Inner Security Cabinet threatened to suspend any further troop withdrawal in the West Bank pending Palestinian fulfilment of a number of conditions, including a public renunciation of incitement and violence.

The Palestinian Authority rejected that stance, saying Israel cannot present new conditions for implementation of the Wye accord.

The United States also criticized the Israeli threat. But at the same time, American officials upheld Israel's position that its recent release of Palestinian prisoners was done in accordance with the Wye agreement, which was signed in October.

Tensions between Israel and the Palestinians have been rising in the days leading up to Clinton's arrival in the region. The president hopes his visit to Israel and Palestinian self-rule areas will help to further the peace process by building upon the goodwill established at Wye.

During his visit, Clinton is scheduled to attend a meeting in the Gaza Strip at which the Palestine National Council and other Palestinian groups are expected to approve the revocation of those clauses in the Palestinian charter that call for the destruction of Israel.

Student strike comes to an end

By RELLY SA'AR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — After a 44-day protest, 600 arrests and some 50 casualties, the National Student Union ended its nationwide strike last week, clearing the way for the university year to begin as early as this week.

Although student leaders reached an agreement with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, they refused to sign the document, signaling their disappointment with the outcome of negotiations with the government.

The agreement promises a 50 percent tuition break to any student who tutors disadvantaged children, and subsidized loans to all students, to be paid back after graduation.

Netanyahu congratulated the nation's students "for putting an end to their strike and returning to their studies, despite the fact that their representatives were unable to stand behind the agreement" by not signing.

Meanwhile, substantial progress was made in negotiations with the union representing university professors, which has threatened to cancel undergraduate classes over salary issues.

Duma fails to censure anti-Semitic lawmaker

BY LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Some 500 people gathered recently in a Moscow square to express support for a Communist lawmaker who recently escaped parliamentary censure after making several anti-Semitic remarks.

"We all live in poverty, and Zionists in government are to blame. They think only how to destroy Russia, and when a patriot calls a spade a spade, they immediately want to throw him in jail," said Nina Drobysheva, who attended the rally for Albert Makashov.

The significance of the rally's turnout is unclear. It was far less than the roughly 2,000 people who turned out in Moscow two weeks ago at a rally honoring slain liberal lawmaker Galina Starovoitova.

The rally, held in bitterly cold weather, came on the heels of a nationwide public opinion poll conducted last week that strongly suggests a majority of Russians do not share the views of the demonstrators.

Some 83 percent of the poll's more than 1,500 respondents said public statements insulting Jews should not be allowed; only eight percent said they should be allowed.

Roughly 43 percent said they opposed the Duma's failure to censure Makashov for his anti-Semitic remarks, while 23 percent supported the body's failure to act. The poll's margin of error is about 3.5 percent.

Dmitry Vasilyev, leader of the ultranationalist group Pamyat, and other speakers at the rally hailed Makashov as a Russian patriot.

Some speakers were critical of the Communist Party's equivocal stance on the controversy, and others were particularly outraged by a recent meeting that Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov held with German Jewish leader Ignatz Bubis in an apparent attempt to save his party from further international embarrassment over Makashov.

The flags above the crowd at the rally represented the full spectrum of contemporary Russian ultranationalism – from the white, yellow and black colors of monarchists to red Soviet-era flags to white banners with black crosses belonging to the small, rabidly anti-Semitic National People's Party.

One of the newspapers sold at a rally called on its readers in large-print letters "to clear Moscow of the wicked Jews."

Though the Russian criminal code prohibits this sort of "incitement to racial hatred," authorities have not prosecuted any of the dozens of Russian papers spewing hate that are regularly sold at many of Moscow's subway stations.

Meanwhile, the Moscow Prosecutor's Office said it would investigate a small ultranationalist group to see if the group could be charged under Russia's hate crimes law for a rally it held. The leader of the Black Hundreds, named after a czarist-era group known for its role in pogroms, said the demonstration was not anti-Semitic and that its participants used humorous slogans to protest the "Jewish-controlled media."

Demonstrators gather at a Moscow square in a show of support for Communist lawmaker Albert Makashov. Makashov recently escaped censure after making several anti-Semitic remarks.

France to examine restitution

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — France will create a new body to examine restitution claims made by the heirs of Jews whose property was looted during the Nazi occupation of the country.

"We know that no reparation will ever be sufficient, because what was committed is irreparable. At the same time, it is fair that those whose property was seized – or their descendants – obtain some kind of reparation," Prime Minister Lionel Jospin told Jewish leaders over the weekend at the annual dinner of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations.

More than half a century after the end of the war, France is still grappling with charges that it is reluctant to come to grips with the collaborationist past of its wartime Vichy government.

Jospin denied a suggestion by Jewish leaders that banks, insurance companies and other state agencies were dragging their feet in turning over their archives to a government-appointed panel known as the Matteoli Commission, which is investigating the systematic plundering of Jewish assets during the war.

"The deliberate discreet nature of [the commission's] work should not mask the extent and quality of the results it has already achieved thanks to the active cooperation of the state agencies concerned," Jospin said.

Yet he promised that his left-wing government would allot some $1.75 million to hire more staff for the Matteoli Commission and said he had already asked various ministries in possession of wartime files to devote more personnel to search for records of the confiscations.

Jospin added that the commission would set up the new office to hear individual claims, and once it had completed its probe, would suggest a means of compensation.

The prime minister also reassured Jewish leaders that the commission's final report on its inquiry would be completed by the end of 1999.

During the dinner, CRIF president Henri Hajdenberg accused state agencies and financial institutions of balking at the probe.

"Because of a shortage of staff and a lack of goodwill in certain ministries and official bodies, we fear the final official report will not be ready before the year 2000," Hajdenberg said.

Hajdenberg also asked that more than two tons of gold plundered by the Nazis and returned to France after the war be allocated to needy concentration camp survivors, and be used to construct a Holocaust memorial and create a nationwide school curriculum on the Holocaust.

It would "not be moral" for the looted gold "to be used merely to help fill the state's coffers," Hajdenberg said.

Jospin did not reply directly, but he said France had recently pledged about $3.5 million to an international fund to help Holocaust survivors.

Hajdenberg, who in the past has kept a relatively low profile on the restitution issue, gave a hard-hitting speech at the dinner, making it clear that the Jewish community had to be reckoned with.

He was especially harsh on the insurance companies, accusing them of making no effort to seek out survivors or their heirs while profiting from their money.

"It would be entirely intolerable for the misappropriated savings of the victims to continue to enrich financial institutions, whether private or state-controlled" he said.

Nazi loot addressed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A wonderful revival meeting is how Irving Abella describes last week's historic Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets.

Abella, one of seven Canadian delegates to attend the conference, said there was a sense among the 44 participating nations that the return of war-time assets is a moral issue.

"Each country tried to match, if not out-do, the [commitments] of the previous country," Abella told The CJN upon his return from the four-day conference. "It was really quite remarkable."

The conference's goal was to establish steps for the return of artworks and communal property, and the payment of insurance policies.

In the end, countries and participating non-governmental groups adopted 11 non-binding principles, which would impose a moral commitment on the nations of the world to find, identify and publicize looted artworks with a view toward finding their owners or the owner's heirs.

Although non-binding, the resolutions have the backing of the United States, Abella pointed out.

As well, the Americans led the way in establishing three commissions: Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, will head the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States; Lawrence Eagleburger, a former U.S. Secretary of State will head the commission on insurance policies; and Ronald Lauder, chair of the Museum of Modern Art, will head the commission examining looted art.

Lauder was quoted as saying that 110,000 pieces of art, worth between $10 and $30 billion, are still missing or unaccounted for.

The Russian delegation played a major role, delivering three important documents on art looted from Austrian Jews. Russia also promised it would try to identify and return so-called "victim art" – treasures the Nazis took but which were later plundered by Stalin's troops as "reparations" from Germany.

Abella said Canada played the role of "moral bystander," lending expertise in the area of Holocaust education. An international consortium, consisting of the United States, Great Britain, Sweden, Germany and Israel was created to examine Holocaust curricula in schools and public education.

Canada ups aid ante

WASHINGTON — Canada has pledged $92 million over four years to assist Palestinian development in self-rule areas.

The money will go toward economic and social assistance, Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Minister for International Cooperation Diane Marleau announced last week.

Axworthy was one of 50 foreign ministers attending the Conference to Support Middle East Peace and Development, held in Washington.

Ottawa's contribution to the roughly $3 billion in worldwide aid to the Palestinian Authority is almost double its previous pledge.

In 1993, Canada committed $55 million over five years to the West Bank and Gaza Strip in support of the peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians.

This past June, Marleau, in a visit to Israel and the territories, pledged nearly $600,000 to several peace initiatives.

Canada's assistance will help Palestinians build health clinics and sanitation and water facilities, a statement from Foreign Affairs said.

Funding for Canada's latest pledge was provided for in the February 1998 federal budget.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 30

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he is ready to reopen peace talks with Syria without any preconditions. He denied reports that Syrian President Hafez al-Assad had sent a message offering Israel peace with Lebanon and Syria in return for a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Dec. 1

• Israeli media reported that Yasser Arafat had referred to eastern Jerusalem as "occupied territory" that Israel had to return under the terms of UN Security Council resolutions. Arafat made the comment at the end of a donors' conference in Washington that netted the PA pledges of more than $3 billion (US) in aid from 50 countries, including Canada.

Dec. 2

• Israeli troops opened fire on Palestinian protesters in the West Bank after the demonstrators beat two Israelis, one of them a soldier, and set fire to their car. The protesters were demanding the release of Palestinian activists held in Israeli jails.

• Israeli police believe that a Jewish extremist may have been responsible for the stabbing death of a 41-year-old Palestinian father of six in eastern Jerusalem. Police are investigating possible links between the killing and six previous stabbings of Arabs, one of them fatal, that began late last year in a haredi neighborhood in Jerusalem.

Dec. 3

• Rabbi Mordechai Ashkenazi said the Lubavitch movement would cut all ties with Netanyahu. Calling the prime minister a "crook and a swindler," Rabbi Ashkenazi told a group of followers that Netanyahu's willingness to return more West Bank territory to the PA reneged on a promise he made during the 1996 election campaign.

Dec. 4

• The number of Israeli families living below the poverty line decreased slightly in Israel in 1997. But the rates remain high among large families, single-parent families and the elderly. Some 730,000 people lived below the poverty line in 1997.

Poland seeks extradition of alleged prosecutor

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A 79-year-old Jewish woman living in England is facing possible extradition to Poland for her alleged role in prosecuting and executing a leading Polish war hero more than 40 years ago.

Polish Justice Minister Hanna Suchowka has reportedly asked the British authorities to extradite Helena Brus to face charges of falsifying evidence and wrongful arrest in her role as a chief prosecutor in Poland's Stalinist show trials during the 1950s.

The Polish authorities claim that in 1951, Helena Wolinska, as she was then known, ordered the arrest of Gen. Emil Fieldorf, a former leader of the anti-Communist Polish resistance movement, because he had refused to collaborate with the new Communist regime in Poland.

The Polish authorities now allege that Fieldorf was falsely accused of having killed Soviet soldiers and Communists.

He was executed one year after his 1952 trial, but he was posthumously cleared of all charges when the Communist regime collapsed in Poland in 1989.

Brus, who has lived in Britain for the past 26 years, is now a British citizen, and married to Wlodzimierz Brus, a retired Oxford University professor. They have one son.

She has denied the charges, which carry a 10-year jail term.

Speaking from her Oxford home, she described the allegations as a "shameful pack of absurd lies. I welcome the news about the extradition request because I will at last be able to give the real answer – to reveal in front of unbiased people the absurdity of the allegations against me," she said.

"It makes me furious. I don't give a damn about the Polish authorities, but I am upset about the attitude of those in England."

Brus has refused to discuss her role in the Stalinist trials, but said she had served in the Polish Resistance during World War II.

"I came from the Warsaw Ghetto," she said, "and was in the underground movement, which is how I survived."

Brus is reluctant to return to Poland because she does not believe she will get a fair trial there. She said she wants to answer the charges in Britain.

Janusz Palus, a spokesman for the Polish military prosecutor, said Brus had contravened Communist-era law by holding the general for more than six months without charge.

"She used her role as a military prosecutor to persecute opponents of the Communist regime on the basis of their political view or their religious faiths," he said.

Musical a new 'Zion King'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jeffrey Katzenberg, one of three celebrity partners behind the Hollywood mega-studio Dreamworks SKG—the others are Steven Spielberg and David Geffen – breezed into Toronto recently as part of a four-city North American tour to promote the company's latest cinematic offering, The Prince of Egypt.

A visually stunning 90-minute animated musical, The Prince of Egypt breaks new ground, being the first full-length animated film to focus on a Biblical narrative – in this case, the story of Moses. Another first: its director, Brenda Chapman, who was also in Toronto, is being touted as the first female director of an animated feature.

The film also sets a precedent in its Hollywood-style treatment of the story, which highlights the relationship between Moses and his "brother" Rameses, the man who will be Pharoah.

The film paints them as rambunctious teenagers who, as grown-ups, are reluctantly driven apart by a destiny that neither one wants, or regrettably, seems capable of understanding.

The high-powered vocal talent includes Val Kilmer as Moses, Ralph Fiennes as Rameses, Jeff Goldblum as Aaron, Sandra Bullock as Miriam, Patrick Stewart as Pharoah Seti, and Steve Martin and Martin Short as court wizards.

Moses (Val Kilmer, left) is wed to Tzipporah (Michelle Pfeiffer), the daughter of Jethro (Danny Glover), the High Priest of Midian.

When 80 years of action is crammed into 1½ hours of cinematic time, major compromises are inevitable. God is practically written out of the script, for instance, and the revelation at Sinai seems tacked on as a hasty afterthought. Most of the film's intended audience (adults and children alike) probably won't mind the overly simplified narrative, however, dazzled as they're bound to be by the visuals and by Stephen (Pocahontas) Schwartz's and Hans (The Lion King) Zimmer's silly but catchy music.

Jeffrey Katzenberg

"We went through a lot of angst and fear and trepidation about what the voice of God would be, and what this event would look like and feel like, because God is a very sensitive subject to a lot of people. The one thing we weren't going to do was have a booming voice like Earl Ray Jones."

Studio technicians tried blending a multiplicity of voices to represent the Lord, but wound up with a sound so distracting that listeners couldn't concentrate on the words. Another simulated voice "ended up sounding like a computer named HAL in 2001," Chapman confided.

Dreamworks consulted hundreds of religious leaders, historians and scholars while making the film to ensure no one would find it offensive. Some scholars suggested using the voice of Moses for God, so Moses wouldn't be afraid.

Though he's not credited with the role onscreen, Val Kilmer was ultimately given the honor of speaking the part of God in the $70 million (US) production, which has taken four years to complete.

Three Cds

So confident is Dreamworks of having a hit on their hands (which they probably do) that they've produced three related CD albums by top recording artists. The CDs are already in stores, weeks in advance of the movie's scheduled opening of Dec. 18.

Some wry pundit has already noted that Katzenberg, who received a golden handshake worth tens of millions when he left Disney several years ago, has gone from The Lion King to The Zion King. Katzenberg says it was Spielberg who first suggested the idea for The Prince of Egypt "and I didn't have to hear it twice."

"David (Geffen) gave me a wonderful piece of advice. He said, 'You can't slap a happy ending on it, you must do it faithfully and you must do it accurately. And you don't know anything.' Four more truthful words were never spoken than 'You don't know anything,'" said Katzenberg.

According to Chapman, the short burning bush scene was "the most difficult thing to do in the movie, and it was the last scene completed. We thought of doing it off-screen but I think the audience would have felt cheated.

CHOIR SINGS YIDDISH

Echo, a 60-member choir of women's voices, brightens the bleak mid-winter with All Women Singing, a rousing concert of music from many lands and cultures. A variety of folk songs and seasonal selections are performed in English, Spanish, Ukrainian and Yiddish. Dec. 13, 3 p.m. Humbercrest United Church, 16 Baby Point Rd. Adults $10. 537-2526.

Theatre News: Theresa Tova's acclaimed and award-winning play, Still the Night, has been published by Scirocco Drama; the book is available at TheatreBooks.

A well-known Yiddish songstress and star of the former TV show ENG, Tova has been touring the United States in the last few months with a Livent production of Ragtime; she's been playing the role of anarchist Emma Goldman.

The latest word from Livent is that its touring production of Ragtime is still on the rails, even as the beleaguered company massively cuts back elsewhere in an attempt to fend off bankruptcy.

Book News: British Columbian children's author Ellen Schwartz was in Toronto recently for a couple of readings. She's the author of the lovely children's book Mr. Belinsky's Bagels (illustrated by Stefan Czernecki), in which the title character must work hard to keep up with the competition when a fancy new bakery opens across the street.

When reading this book to their children, alert parents may notice a few Jewish visual symbols embedded into the story, adding to the fun. See if you can spot them. (Tradewind Books, $19.95)

In the Spotlight: In the Depression-era 1930s, when organized crime was rampant and people relied on books and movies to help them forget their troubles, two young men in Cleveland, Ohio, came up with an idea for Superman, a comic book hero who would prove popular and as durable as steel.

Joe Shuster, who was born in Toronto in 1914, moved with his family to Cleveland around 1931, and met Jerry Siegel at his new high school soon afterwards. Shuster and Siegel, both science fiction fans, collaborated on the Superman comic idea for years until the first issue was printed by Action Comics in June 1938.

The comic took off immediately, and Superman became an instant success that eventually spawned toys, TV shows, movies – and a whole range of imitators.

The evolution of this popular comic book hero from his inception to the present day is carefully chronicled in Superman: The Complete History, by Les Daniels, a lavishly illustrated coffee-table book (Chronicle, $44.95). A colorful and nostalgic look back over this cultural icon's first 60 years of life, the book offers examples of rare comic book art, working sketches and original character designs.

Toronto is given its due credit as the model for certain elements in the Superman story. Superman's alter-ego, Clark Kent, worked as a reporter for the Daily Planet in a city known as Metropolis; the newspaper had been modelled on the Toronto Daily Star and the city on Toronto itself.

Fans of the legendary man of steel will enjoy flipping through the book, but anyone interested in the veiled Jewish elements that Shuster and Siegel put into their work won't find them mentioned here.

Funky AshkeTANTS set

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Get into the groove. This year's AshkeTANTS Yiddish dance party is going to be funkier than ever.

"It's going to be very dance-oriented," said David Buchbinder, the event's artistic director and leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Buchbinder has put together a hot lineup of musicians for the Ashkenaz All-Stars that includes local musicians Daniel Barnes, Steve Donald, Andrew Downing, Levon Ichkhanian, Ravi Nampally and Ernie Tollar.

There will be a mix of music, from traditional klezmer and Yiddish to Israeli and Arab songs.

"We'll be doing the whole Mediterranean thing," Buchbinder said. "Both in the Yiddish and in the other songs we'll be doing funk, funk grooves and soul," so people can dance many different styles.

"Our aim is to make it as high a party as we can. It's going to be a Yiddish rave."

The AshkeTANTS is a warmup to the biennial Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture that will take place this summer.

Buchbinder has already sifted through "a huge mound of applications" for that festival and promises that "this will be the most international Ashkenaz Festival yet."

One of the novelties this summer will be a 20-piece band of international Yiddish musicians that will perform songs created for the event.

The AshkeTANTS dance party takes place Dec. 12, 8 p.m at the Bloor JCC. Tickets $10 advance/ $12 at the door. Call 924-6211.

Eight Nights, Eight Lights

TORONTO — Eight Nights, Eight Lights, a festive and reflective event for Chanukah, will again combine shadow puppetry, masks and songs at the annual event presented by Ashkenaz and the Bloor JCC.

"We will have a very festive atmosphere," said director Anne Barber. "The auditorium of the Bloor JCC will be full of activities including dreidel games, singing and chanukiyah workshops."

Shamash will come out of the darkness to introduce eight vignettes. After each one, the actors involved will light a candle.

"There are eight separate vignettes, each one different from the other," Barber said. "For example one will feature two bubbies making latkes and another will have a girl reading from Anne Frank's diary. So each light will have a different theme, reflecting the different themes of the holiday like friendship, freedom."

Dec. 13 at the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. 11:30 a.m. Tickets are $2 for children, $7 for adults, $8 for families and include latkes. Call 924-6211.

How to Calculate Spousal Support

One of the most vexing questions for lawyers and their clients is, How to calculate spousal support? Unlike the Child Support Guidelines, there is no legislation that imposes a grid or tables of "dollars per month" which depends on the payer's income or any other factors. Rather, clients are at the mercy of what appear to be many conflicting and inconsistent decisions, often within the same Court! As a result, I sometimes receive inquiries from senior colleagues about my "gut feeling" for an appropriate spousal support number in a given situation. Often, no one has the slightest idea.

In Canada's Divorce Act and provincial legislation, we do have general philosophical principles governing what a Court must consider when assessing a spousal support claim and what factors it must review. For instance, the Court must assess the years of cohabitation, the number of children, if any, the parties' means and needs, and the economic consequences of marriage on a particular individual, particularly if she relinquished part of her career outside the home to raise the children and clean toilets. The Court must also consider the relevance of any prenuptial agreement (also known as a marriage contract.)

Amount of support not specified in Act

However, the legislation does not provide numbers or even a rough guide to numbers. So, lawyers are left scrambling to look at what Judges in similar cases have awarded. The problem is that there is such a vast library of cases dealing with spousal support that even the use of a computerized legal research facility would make the job only marginally easier.

These online legal research services search cases by "keywords". After typing in these keywords, you might get cases similar to your case. However, this method is generally unsuccessful when dealing with "spousal support" because this phrase shows up in so many case digests that your online search yields a prohibitively large number of "hits," the majority of which are not, in essence, cases that answer the question: How much and for how long?

New database predicts support amount

Working with Martin Adler of Lipton Adler Computer Consultants Ltd. (Toronto), about one year ago I developed a new, more efficient system. We call it the Spousal Support Database. With the help of able legal staff, we summarized over 6000 cases that were decided in Canada since 1992, when the Supreme Court of Canada issued its most recent decision on spousal support (Moge). These decisions represent virtually every case in which Judges offered written reasons for their verdict. We fed the summaries into a computer program that can, in a sense, predict what a Court might order for spousal support given existing case law.

All we need to know are the age of the parties, their respective gross incomes, the number of children they have (if any), the length of cohabitation, the parties' respective ages, and any special circumstances (such as illness or disability.) The database provides a possible "range" of orders with real numbers, not just philosophical principles.

The results of this project have been amazing. We receive several requests daily for searches from lawyers across Canada. For a nominal fee we courier a colourful chart showing how a number of cases similar to that of the lawyer's client were decided. We also enclose all the case summaries and two other charts for easy comparison.

Many senior lawyers in the Toronto area have endorsed the project and it is quickly becoming become part of our legal culture. It is especially useful for parties who wish to settle a case rather than pursuing ongoing litigation. The project has even been favorably commented upon by a Judge of the Ontario Court in a decision released in December 1997.

So, there is hope. Spousal support does not have to remain an enigma.

In closing, I would like to wish you and your family a very Happy Chanukah.

TRAVEL TALK

INGERSOLL'S BIG CHEESE & THE ELMHURST INN

A huge cheese wheel, more than six feet in diameter and three tons in weight, helped bring a measure of fame to the southern Ontario town of Ingersoll, near London, in the last century.

Regional dairy farmers, concerned because they were producing much more cheese than could be consumed locally, exported the huge cheese to world's fairs in New York state and England in the 1860s, making headlines wherever the cheese appeared.

Legend has it that while the cheese was sailing home from England, its odor so offended the ship's crew that much of it had to be dumped overboard to avoid a mutiny. The rest was divvied up among the workers of the five cheese factories in Ingersoll that had manufactured it. From then on, southern Ontario was said to rank near Derbyshire as a producer of fine cheese.

Much of this history is captured in documents and artifacts in the Ingersoll Cheese Factory Museum. The museum is part of a complex of heritage buildings that also includes a blacksmith shop, farm museum, community museum and the hockey hall of fame.

Displays in the community museum recapture the flavor of life of a bygone era. Some items pertain to Major Thomas Ingersoll, the former Massachusetts resident who founded the town in 1793, and his more famous daughter, Laura Ingersoll Secord, the War of 1812 heroine.

Also on display, are a foot-powered drill and other implements resembling instruments of torture; they belonged to the late Dr. Kennedy, a local dentist. Edgar Dunlop, who operated a barber shop in Ingersoll from 1909 into the 1980s, bequeathed to the museum his barber chairs and shop fittings. The museum also has a display on Aimee Semple McPherson, the popular bible-thumping evangelist who was born in nearby Salford in 1890.

In winter, the museums are open by appointment only; to arrange a visit, contact the town office (519-485-0120).

More local history may be found along King Street, which once formed part of the stagecoach route between Hamilton and London. At the corner of Hall Street is a building with covered porches that, in the last century, was an inn that serviced the stagecoaches. Many more elegant century homes may be seen along Ann, Albert and Oxford streets.

James Harris was the entrepreneurial farmer who thought up the mammoth piece of cheese. His 1867 Victorian house is now the centre of the 49-room Elm Hurst Inn. Its peaked roofs, pointed gothic windows, four-story tower and decorative gingerbread trim, give the inn much of its character.

The original house is now the Victorian Mansion Restaurant, in which diners are seated in an array of cozy high-ceilinged rooms of varied dimensions. Most are named after members of the British royal family; one holds a portrait of Queen Victoria. The rooms upstairs are more intimate: one chamber, just big enough for a table for two, is a favorite of newlyweds and couples on the brink of betrothal.

Several ski trails

The inn's 43 rooms, six suites various meeting rooms and country spa are housed in a modern wing whose peaked roofs and pointed windows reflect the style of the original building. When ground was broken for the Harris homestead the territory was still known as Canada West. Today, when viewed from the windows, the gently rolling, bucolic landscape that immediately surrounds the inn seems almost magically untouched by time.

Half an hour by car to London, and roughly 40 minutes to Stratford, Ingersoll is a feasible stopover point for those attending productions at London's Grand Theatre or at Stratford. For winter visitors, the area boasts several hiking and cross-country skiing trails.

Located beside Highway 401 (exit 218) at the junction with Highway 19, The Elm Hurst Inn offers day and overnight spa and other packages, with rates beginning around $72.50 per person (double occupancy). For details phone 519-485-5321 or 800-561-5321. E-mail [elmhurst@ oxford.net]; Web site [http://www. oxford.net/~elmhurst/].

Versatile performer 'discovered' in Toronto subway

By LORI FIREMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Eric Fink has one thing in common with Lana Turner. Though he could never hope nor want to walk a mile in her shapely sweaters, he shares with the buxom blonde the luck of having been in the right place at the right time.

He was on a Toronto subway when he drew the attention of former magazine editor Beverly Rocket, who thought he had the perfect look for the cover of the now-defunct City Woman magazine.

It was not long before he launched an acting career, which finds him, some 18 years later, a veteran of stage, screen and television.

He is now starring in the North American premiere of Ladies' Night, the play on which the Oscar-nominated film The Full Monty is based.

Eric Fink

In the play, currently at New Yorker Theatre at 651 Yonge St., Fink plays nightclub owner Bernie Lapinski, "a cross between Liberace and Neil Diamond in appearance, who sounds and acts like Rodney Dangerfield."

Fink was already 30 when he got his start as an actor, and though he had lived in New York for eight years working in television production, he had never shown interest in being on the other side of the camera.

He started off as a delivery boy and worked his way up to producer easily. Always a sharp dresser, Fink laughs now as he describes himself then, "dressed to the nines in fancy suits, and I always had a cigar."

His cigar, he said, was a tribute to the old-school style of performers like his idols Groucho Marx and George Burns, and even in the environmentally-correct '90s, his cigar remains close to his heart, if not his lungs.

A Toronto native, Fink first went to New York because "[I was] always a hack...and always felt connected to show biz, and to the performers I grew up watching on The Ed Sullivan Show."

Fink met Sullivan in a chance encounter at the Plaza Hotel, and considering the way he was "discovered" on the subway, it might be tempting to dismiss his success as a lucky break, but that would only be partly right. For whatever area he tackles, whether it be producing and directing Infinity Factory, a U.S. TV show about mathematics, or writing, or acting, there is no denying that Fink is good at what he does.

A versatile actor who never studied the craft, Fink's roles have "ranged from nerdy wimps to mafiosos and suave maitre d' types," although lately he has been doing mostly comedy, in roles such as banana peddler Haskell in The Immigrant at Manitoba Theatre Centre Warehouse and his current character in Ladies Night.

When asked about his future plans, the father of three already show-biz kids says, "Acting is my first love...whatever the medium... but I do think I have good instincts in directing, so I'd have to see what opportunities were out there."

Fruits, veggies aid seniors' memories

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Patients who do not have Alzheimer disease can suffer memory loss from not eating enough fresh fruits and vegetables, a research scientist told 200 people at the Ada Starkman lecture series at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Appetites decline in later years, she said, and seniors may need supplements to replace the minerals they lose, said Dr. Carole Greenwood of the Centre's Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit.

The lecture was sponsored by the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

Greenwood, who practises "bedside nutrition", said the optimum number of dietary fruits and vegetables has doubled in the last few years.

Seniors also have problems getting enough calcium in their diets, and must be reminded that the calcium must be combined with vitamin D to be of benefit to their bones, said Greenwood.

A moderate intake of alcohol – one or two glasses a day – can be beneficial, she said.

Brain function

Sexual desires in seniors do not go away and their physical and emotional healths cannot be separated, said Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of Baycrest's medical services.

There is no question that physical activity helps keep older people healthy, and Dr. Gordon recommended simple and cheap exercises like walking, swimming and bicycle riding.

The speakers were thanked by Beverley Black whose family sponsored the series.

TORONTO — Researchers at Baycrest Centre's Rotman Research Institute (RRI) have unveiled new methods of enhancing brain function in older people.

Dr. Cheryl Grady, a psychiatry professor at University of Toronto, speaking at the final lecture sponsored by Baycrest Centre Foundation and the Beverley and Aaron Black family, said that the brain's frontal lobes – located just under the eyes – can become so activated, that people from age 60 to 75 can do just as well as those in their 20s in recalling paired words such as parent/piano.

This is the result, she said,when both groups are given time to study the pairs.

The seniors also do as well as those much younger in recognizing faces, if the time frame in which the faces are presented is reduced to 21 seconds.

Again, in this experiment, the frontal lobes of the older people showed increased activity, said Grady.

These results come from RRI's use of Positron Emission Tomography (PET), which charts brain activity in much the same way as Medical Research Imaging (MRI).

"Unfortunately, we're not getting [the results] out to doctors and nurses in the community," said Dr. Donald Stuss, Baycrest's vice-president of research and RRI director. "We have to bypass them."

In PET studies, a part of the central brain known as the hippocampus, has shown to be important for memory, particularly in younger people, Grady said.

The revolutionary changes in brain activity for older people, come as a result of animal research, which shows that neurons in the brain can be re-aroused, instead of withering away, as once thought, Stuss said.

Rats that had increased brain activity, had brains that weighed more than those in rats which were inactive, he said.

Stuss agreed with an audience member, that learning activity of every kind is helpful in cognitive ability for seniors.

Heredity makes a difference in cognitive function, he said."There might be a predisposition to Alzheimer disease, but we don't know what the triggers are."

There is no definitive research done on the relationship of herbal remedies and estrogens to memory, he said.

The research presented has far-reaching implications for seniors, the researchers said, and resulted in a request from the audience that the results be printed and distributed to the public.

Elaine Todres, Baycrest Foundation president said, "This is an example of the ground-breaking research at Rotman. An institute that did not exist 10 years ago, is now one of the top five research centres in the world."

Glaucoma campaign launched

TORONTO — A new national glaucoma awareness campaign was launched recently to combat Canadians' ignorance of the disease.

Mission For Sight hopes to educate Canadians about the risk factors for glaucoma and the importance of early treatment. The campaign will include an information booklet, posters, a toll-free information number and a speakers program.

It's sponsored by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CNIB), Shoppers Drug Mart and ophthalmic products manufacturer Alcon Laboratories.

A recent poll by Environics Research found that 72 percent of Canadians are unaware that glaucoma is a leading cause of blindness.

And even more don't know what the risk factors are for the disease, according to the Alcon-sponsored survey.

Glaucoma silently and gradually reduces the peripheral vision of its victims as nerve cells at the back of the eye slowly die. Most people don't notice their eyesight has been reduced until the very late stages of the disease, because glaucoma spares central vision.

Although anyone may develop glaucoma, the elderly and those with high blood pressure in the eye or a family history of glaucoma are at greatest risk.

More than 200,000 Canadians have the disease, but it's estimated that only half of them are aware of it and are taking steps to preserve their sight. By the year 2000, about 67 million people worldwide will have glaucoma.

"Many people do not realize that glaucoma is a blinding disease without any warning symptoms," said Dr. Neeru Gupta, director of the glaucoma unit at St. Michael's Hospital. "The good news is that in most cases, blindness can be prevented if the disease is caught at its early stages, treated and monitored closely."

Shoppers Drug Mart stores across Canada are participating in the campaign by distributing the booklets, displaying posters and hosting in-store education clinics for people in high-risk groups.

To receive more information about glaucoma, call the CNIB's toll-free information line at 1-800-513-7813.

Queen brings joy to Chanukah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The air in the schoolyard is cold and damp on this October morning. Oblivious to the rain, a group of children play on the outdoor wooden jungle gym.

When a scuffle breaks out in another part of the schoolyard, they head towards the commotion. Some older boys have ganged up on a 11-year boy. A 6-year-old girl soon joins the fray to help her brother fight off the bullies.

But the fight is as phoney as the artificial snow strewn around the schoolyard to dress it up as if it were winter. Just as the young girl tries to tackle one of the boys, a loud voice yells, "Cut!" and the cameras stop rolling.

The scene, shot on location at Blythwood Junior Public School, is from Jenny and the Queen of Light, a made-for-TV holiday special that will air on Global television Dec. 12 at 7 p.m.

Jenny and the Queen of Light, by playwright Dennis Foon, is based on the book, Jenny and the Chanukah Queen, by Canadian children's author Jean Little.

The story centres around 6-year-old Jenny, played by Cassandra Van Wyck, and her 11-year-old brother Eli (Michael Seater). The two children and their recently widowed mother (Susan Coyne) have just moved to a new town, and they are under a great deal of stress coping with the loss of their father and adjusting to their new home.

With the holiday season approaching, Jenny summons the help of her imaginary hero, the Queen of Light, in the hope of making the upcoming Chanukah celebration a joyful time for her family.

Queen of Light is co-produced by the Toronto-based production companies, Breakthrough Entertainment and Metaphor Enterprises. Co-producer Larry Zack of Metaphor Enterprises spoke to The CJN on the set of the film.

He bought the rights to Little's book

Travel, Arts & Business

four years ago, he said, because he felt the story has universal appeal.

"I think everyone responds to difficulties at holiday season. Just about every culture is involved in some sort of celebration."

He said he was drawn to the project because he loved the way the little girl is able to bring her dysfunctional family together at Chanukah.

"Jenny creates a holiday heroine to help her, and she in turn is able to help her own family."

The story is centred around children, he noted. "They're the stars of the show. They're extraordinary. It's not easy work. It's unusual for kids to carry the whole story."

He said he asked Rabbi Larry Pinsker to be a consultant for the film to avoid a religious faux pas in telling the story.

After developing the script with Foon, Zack said he approached Breakthrough, which produces The Adventures of Dudley the Dragon, about collaborating on Queen of Light because that production company has significant experience with family television.

He added that one of the principals of Breakthrough, Ira Levy, happens to be his cousin. They're both Hamilton natives.

Levy said he was eager to join the project because he thought it offered a wonderful family story with "a beautiful screenplay by Dennis Foon."

He said Breakthrough has "an affinity for this kind of show" because it has "a good story with underlying values that we can share. There's a heart and soul and core to it."

A lot of funding agencies were attracted to the show because the Chanukah theme made it stand out from other holiday specials, he said.

"It was something different... There's a plethora of Christmas shows. We live in a multicultural society. People are more willing to share a diversity of stories. Jenny is a perfect example of that."

One of the themes of the story – outsiders becoming part of a larger community – has wide appeal, he said, because there are many immigrants in this country trying to integrate into the greater Canadian society, as well as groups like the Jewish community who still feel a strong connection to their immigrant roots.

Starring in Jenny and the Queen of Light are [from left] Michael Seater, Cassandra Van Wyck as Jenny and Susan Coyne.

"Queen of Light is emblematic of the spirit of hope and becoming part of something, part of a family and a community. Those are important stories to tell."

Dana Rosenblatt

'Dangerous Dana' Rosenblatt wins title

By LENN ZONDER
Special to The CJN

LEDYARD, CT. — Managers and coaches often exhort their athletes to give it their all, to leave "it" on the playing field or in the ring. At Foxwoods Resort Casino in Ledyard, Ct. recently, Dana Rosenblatt did exactly that, almost to his, and his supporters', everlasting regret.

For the second fight in a row, Rosenblatt, 33-1, built up an insurmountable lead over the first nine rounds, and had to hang on in desperation until the final bell to preserve his victory.

Rosenblatt won the vacant IBA Middleweight Championship of The World, outpointing former four-time welterweight and junior middleweight champion "Terrible Terry" Norris in a 12-round unanimous decision. Two of the three judges scored the fight 114-112 and the third widened the margin to 116-112.

For the first eight rounds, the margin between the fighters was much greater than that. If you had been at ringside or watching on television, and left at that point thinking the result was a foregone conclusion, the result would have left you curious.

"Dangerous Dana" carried the fight to Norris from the start. He hit him at will with a cutting right jab that bloodied Norris's nose and mouth, and scored heavily. Frequently, he doubled the jab and followed with punishing rights to the chest and abdomen. Most ringside observers thought they were watching an impressive, lopsided victory for the kid with the blue and white trunks, and a Magen David on the left leg.

But midway through the eighth round, Rosenblatt stopped boxing. His potent left hand went into hibernation and instead of punching, he began clutching and holding.

It was more of the same over the next four rounds. Rosenblatt got in some jabs, but never used his left. Despite repeated warnings from referee Steve Smoger, he kept holding Norris rather than boxing. Even after Smoger ordered the two to break, Rosenblatt held on as long as he could.

Norris's managers protested the bout and demanded an immediate rematch because of Smoger's failure to deduct points from Rosenblatt. Neither claim is likely to be upheld by IBA officials.

At a post-fight news conference, Rosenblatt's manager, Joe Lake, sitting in for his fighter, said Dana had gone to the hospital for a couple of stitches to close a cut above his left eye. The truth was Dana had been rushed to the hospital in an ambulance, suffering from dehydration.

In Rosenblatt's previous fight against Arthur Allen, Dangerous Dana dominated the first nine rounds and then hung on as Allen mounted a desperate offensive. Everybody, including Rosenblatt, thought he let the fight get away from him. His effort, while impressive, left nothing in reserve for the final round. Coupled with his 12-round performance in Connecticut, observers are wondering whether there is something physically wrong with the 26-year old from Malden, Mass.

A Boston Globe report expressed concern about Rosenblatt's tendency to fade in a fight's late rounds. It compared Rosenblatt's situation to a similar event in Evander Holyfield's career when the champion inexplicably lost to Michael Moorer. It was first thought that Holyfield may have had an undiscovered heart problem but later it was determined he had so dehydrated himself in training that he lost his stamina during the fight.

Lake said he thought there might be a problem with Rosenblatt's electrolytes.

Rosenblatt, who normally fights at 160, weighed in at 158 for the Norris fight. But weigh-ins are held one to two days before the fight and boxers notoriously add weight in the interim. It is likely that by fight time, Rosenblatt was close to 168.

The IBA title Rosenblatt won is a recognized world title, but not of the first tier. Those titles are held by boxers under promoter Don King's control. King and Top Rank – run by Bob Arum – are more than competitors, they're open enemies, with a great deal of dislike for one another. This enmity makes it unlikely Rosenblatt will get a shot at any of the titles held in higher esteem by boxing mavens.

To get around the problem, there has been some talk of moving Rosenblatt to junior middleweight – 154 pounds – an active division with many quality boxers. But if Rosenblatt dehydrates himself to get down to 160, what would his condition be at 154 or less?

Even before the dehydration problem surfaced, Top Rank began shopping Rosenblatt in Europe and possibly Israel, to fight European champions. Ron Katz, who promotes Rosenblatt for Top Rank, stated openly at the press conference, he is trying to arrange a match with WBA and European Middleweight Champion Laurent Boudouani in France.

But first, Dana must sit down with his doctors, advisers, and his family, to decide his future.

Unlike most boxers, Rosenblatt has some academic credential to fall back on. After high school, Northeastern University offered him a scholarship but he turned it down to enrol at Bunker Hill Community College (BHCC) and pursue his boxing career. He completed two years at BHCC, graduating with a 3.75 grade point average. He is currently attending the University of Massachusetts-Boston and majoring in philosophy.

Rosenblatt, 26, is just the fifth Jewish boxing champion since Bantamweight Robert Cohen in 1954, and the first to hold the middleweight title since Solly Krieger took it from Al Hostak in 1938.

Soccer team holding tryouts

TORONTO — Maccabi Canada is holding tryouts for the 11-man, outdoor soccer team that will represent the Great White North at the Pan American Maccabiah, to be held in Mexico City in July 1999.

Two thousand athletes from 19 countries are expected at the games.

Tryouts in Toronto will be held on Dec. 28 at the Associated Hebrew Schools' Leslie branch, 6100 Leslie St. The morning session runs from 9 a.m. to noon, the afternoon practice from 1:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. Participants are asked to bring any equipment they may need, including indoor and outdoor shoes.

The upcoming Pan Am Maccabiah marks a departure for the Canadian soccer program, which in previous games has sent only a small, indoor team. This time, Canada will field a complete roster and play outdoor soccer. Players must be of Jewish descent and more than 18 years old, according to head coach Martin Scott.

All players are required to complete an application form. Forms are available on the World Wide Web at [www.total.net/~maccabi] or by calling the coach at 905-771-6465. Those selected will be required to pay their own way to Mexico.

The Inside Back

An evening with Yehuda

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

PBP: Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, I'm Ploni ben Ploni, your host of Living History. Tonight we have an exclusive interview with Yehuda Hamaccabee, one of the heroes of the Chanukah story. Mr. Hamaccabee, can you tell, in your own words, what led a bunch of simple Jewish townspeople and farmers to take on the Syrian King Antiochus and his army?

YH: It's a long story. My father, Mattityahu, was a brave man who had enough of those assimilated Hellenistic Jews running the local town. Well, one day, they just announced that all residents and all shuls were going to have to go glatt treyf, and moreover, there wouldn't be any more learning Torah, brit milah, yamim tovim, the whole megillah.

My father stood up in the town square and announced that he was not going to tolerate such an infringement on his religious freedom. Then, after a lot of chakking, he got B'nai Brith, the ADL, and the ACLU to lobby and send strongly worded letters to the Syrian authorities.

Meanwhile, my father formed a revolt committee, got a special projects grant from the local federation, held a Rebellion Gala to raise money and corporate sponsorship, and persuaded the local Jewish paper to cover it. It just spread, spontaneously, like wildfire throughout the land.

Naturally, the higher authorities, who weren't invited to the Gala, didn't like such trouble, so they called in the Syrian army to intervene, and well, before you knew it, we were conducting ambush raids on the Syrians. Of course, we did have God as our chief corporate sponsor. As you know, Ploni, I died in battle in the second year of the rebellion. How did it turn out?

PBP: Well, Yehuda, your brothers continued on fighting, defeated the Syrian army, cleaned and rededicated the Beit Hamikdash, then relit the menorah which burned for eight days, with only one day's worth of oil. Our sages named the holiday Chanukah.

YH: You see, when you have a good corporate sponsor, you can't lose. This name Chanukah, it sounds very nice, maybe catchy even. So, you mean people know of our rebellion?

PBP: Yehuda, today, every Jewish child knows of your heroism, the miracle of the few defeating the enemy, the miracle of the oil that lasted for eight days. In fact, it's one of our most popularly observed holidays. Jews celebrate it by lighting a chanukiyah each night with colorful "dripless" candles, eating foods fried in lots of oil, gambling with a dreidel, giving chocolate coins to children, maybe even learning a little Torah. In fact, I even have a few latkes and soofganiyot here . Please, try one...what do you think?

YH: Hmm...not greasy enough, needs more salt. So, what happened after we rededicated the Beit Hamikdash?

PBP: The Macabees got rid of the Syrians, and re-established Jewish sovereignty under the Hasmonean kings until they became corrupt and then the Romans came, destroyed the second Beit Hamikdash and exiled most of the Jews. It took almost 2,000 years, but finally we have a Jewish state again in Eretz Yisrael. Mind you, we're now in the process of handing parts of it over to another people...

YH: Boy, you do miss a lot of news being dead. Do Jews today do anything else to remember our battles and the miracles?

PBP: I'm sorry to tell you this, Yehuda, but modern Jews also buy large gifts for their children, light huge public menorahs with all the local dignitaries, put up chintzy decorations, send greeting cards, and hold huge parties with lots and lots of eating.

YH: Excuse me for saying so, Ploni, but let me tell you from experience, it's all that mimicking the gentiles that got us into the trouble in the first place. You see...

PBP: Well, I'm afraid that's all the time we have for the tonight's interview. Thank you again, Yehuda Hamaccabee for being my guest. Be sure to join us next week on Living History, for our exclusive interview with King Antiochus, who will give the other side of this fascinating story. Good night.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I seem to be always on the defensive with my parents because they are continually interfering with my choice of classes in school. They nag me to take courses that will "get me somewhere in life." I am tired of hearing about it. I find myself avoiding contact with them as much as possible because I don't want confrontations with them. I want to pick stuff that I am interested in, and it certainly isn't math! Now some of my aunts and uncles have started to get on my case too. Do I have an out?

Frazzled and Frustrated Student

Dear Frazzled and Frustrated Student,

The "somewhere" that you hope to get in life is not your parents' destination, nor your relatives', or your friends' destination. It is yours. Ultimately, you will find that the path to your goals can only be taken by yourself. Taking courses at school is a way of attaining your specific career goal. For example, if you want to be an architect, it would be advisable to take math, physics and art, but if you want to be a journalist, you would possibly take English, and creative writing.

You should explain this to your family and hopefully they will stop pressuring you once they understand your aspirations. Avoiding your parents is not the right way of resolving these issues with them, as it just leads to more conflict. Try to tell your parents that the classes you take are a reflection of your interests and goals. Explain that you want to take courses suited to your needs and strengths.

If you are not sure of your specific career goals yet, but know what subjects you enjoy, then go talk to your school's guidance counsellor, who will be able to objectively look at your strengths and weaknesses and provide some positive direction.

If you do not feel comfortable with a guidance counsellor, then you can speak to a favorite teacher who may also offer you advice on attaining your goals. Do not give up on your dreams so quickly. Other people often expect a lot from you, but it is most important to stay true to yourself and follow your own heart. I am sure that you will excel in the classes that you have chosen and that these classes will direct you towards the career of your choice.

Happy Chanukah

The Canadian Jewish news

SECTION B

The above painting by Reuven Rubin, The Flute Player, evokes feelings of happiness and cheerful serenity. Perhaps more than any other holiday in the Jewish calendar, Chanukah elicits in us those very same sentiments. In the following pages of these Chanukah Greetings, we have reproduced the "winning" entries of our fourth annual Chanukah poetry contest along with a sampling of honorable mentions that celebrate the many emotions of Chanukah. Chag Samayach.

'The light of the candle'

As in years past, we were deeply gratified and moved by the response of our readers to our fourth annual Chanukah poetry contest. We received a great number of wonderfully-crafted, thoughtful, evocative poems.

When bringing personal judgment to bear on creative works, there is, unavoidably, a large subjective element in declaring some works and not others as "winners." But we had no choice. The "winning" entries appear on the pages that follow along with a selection of some of the other poems we received.

We thank everyone who took the time to write and submit a poem. May you do so again next year.

It is our great pleasure therefore to present the winners of the fourth annual CJN Chanukah poetry contest.

Congratulations to:

- Brenda Spigelman Ajzenkopf and I.J. Schecter in the over 18 category,
- Nicole Kallmeyer and Hayah Goldlist in the teen category, and
- Helen Ennok, Hila Huelse, Nina Kagan, Ella Kofman, Leytal Ross and Carly Stone in the 12 and under category.

Reading the poetry, especially the poems of the youngsters, reminds us of the power of the story of this uniquely-celebratory holiday. In their own way, in their own words, in their own rhymes, our children express their connection to their people.

In a certain sense, borrowing the first line of the poem by Brenda Spigelman Aizenkopf, our children, are "the light of the candle" in whose radiant glow we commemorate the holiday, singing praises to them and to God for having brought us to this day.

CHANUKAH PAST

If I were the light of the candle
In the years prior to my living
I'd have known my family's simchah
And the glow that Chanukah was giving.

If I could bring back those olden days
Prior to my people's demise
I would see my grandparents' youth
Their faces with tears in their eyes.

If I were the children's dreidel
My parents would have me to hold
In this Chanukah joy they could love me
And their laughter upon me unfold.

If I were the music and horah
The sound would encircle the room
Right then my world I'd envision
With rainbow and flowers in bloom.

If I could but taste of the moment
Its sweetness and warmth to derive
The festival we call Chanukah
Would sing in my being, alive.

THE FLAME

Upon the wick, with steady hand
I lay the match, at whose command
My eyes in hushed reflection stare
And quietly imagine there

A peasant, who has stood and warred
So that I may this day afford
Who steals across the temple ground
Amid the kinsmen he has found

Then pauses in his weary stride
Before the flame which should have died
And thinks, here, for our desperate fight
One drop of oil, eight days of light

A breeze creeps past my window still
The candle flickers, then is still
Though he and I have never met
Within my soul, the flame burns yet.

By I.J. Schecter

CHANUKAH

For eight days straight the candles are lit
Each tiny flame burning, representing
A union long ago
Where the Maccabees fought, and died in our honor
The brass of our chanukiyot shines, like the metal of their armor
Eight separate days, one nation, one heart

The smell
Of the oil, of wax, of the flame
The taste
Of mama's latkes, special spices of the chag
The legend
Zayde tells, the wisdom in his eyes
The feeling
Of warmth of light

A tiny oil lamp
Who would have thought?
Those eight miraculous days
The menorah glowed in peace
A gift
Perhaps
That tiny oil lamp, that kept hope alive

As we gather round to bless ancient times
And the sevivon spins, round in hypnotic form
We shall never forget
We are one, like the flame
But separated
Like the chanukiyah.

On Chanukah Night ...

We remember our people suffering from slavery
We remember how Mattathias fought so bravely
We remember Antiochus said 'bow' and brought statues to us
We remember that the Maccabees made a fuss
We remember hiding so we could learn Torah
We remember finding oil to light the menorah

So we play with our dreidels and have lots of fun
The letters on it stand for ness, gadol, haya, sham
We get presents and Chanukah gelt
We remember how our people felt
With presents and gelt and dreidels to play
Chanukah is definitely my favorite holiday.

The Eighth Day of Chanukah

On Chanukah night
I watch the candles
glimmering bright.
Each day I count one by one
And watch them burn until they're done.
It was the eighth day of Chanukah and
I didn't want it to end.
I wish Chanukah could come
Next week again.
Lighting those candles
Was so much fun
I wish
It had just begun.
I guess I have to enjoy it
While it's here.
I know Chanukah
Will come back next year.

Chanukah

There are these eight days in a year which bring light to every house.
These days are very tasty, crispy I might add.
We sit very patiently listening to the dreidels spin.

Thinking of "Ness Gadol Haya Sham,"
Families gathering, children saving their tasty gelt.

As we look at the shamash and think how far our Judaism has come,
But the best – ISRAEL – is yet to come.

What a sight to see –
Chanukah, Chanukah

The Chanukah miracle of '36

By LUBA GREENBERG

The month of December approaches, and as the days grow shorter and the nights become longer, I remind myself not to despair, for Chanukah is coming and the Festival of Lights will once more rescue us from the darkness of winter. As we see and feel the warmth of the candles, we will once more experience a renewal of life, a restoration of faith and optimism, and maybe even a miracle.

Many years ago, in 1936, I did experience a miracle during Chanukah. It began in a roundabout fashion.

I was 12 years old and we lived in Kelwood, a small hamlet 200 miles north of Winnipeg. We were the only Jewish family in town. That summer, my father dropped a bombshell – we were moving to Winnipeg, and leaving the place where I had spent my entire life. Our general store was closing and we were going to become city dwellers. Our lifestyle was about to change radically. My mother and older sister were elated at the prospect but I felt overcome with a vague terror and homesickness at the thought of leaving all that was dear and familiar to me.

Our store had been the focus of the main street in town and had provided us with a very good life. Although we visited Winnipeg frequently, I couldn't imagine not coming back to our town.

However, the Great Depression of the 30s had caught up with us, and by 1936 the Prairie had been hit with a vengeance. Young as I was, I was aware of something ominous in the air. From snatches of adult conversation, I heard about the desperation of starving farmers all around us. There was talk of impending war as Hitler raged in Germany, while here in Canada Nazi Bund movements appeared on the prairies, and in Quebec, a man named Adrian convinced people to wear swastikas and to gather in groups to threaten Jews.

A numbing silence seemed to envelop the town. The train no longer dropped visitors at our station – just crowds of men from the cities, so called "Relief Gangs' because relief was all they had to live on. They were on their way to the lumber camps up in the Riding Mountains.

I had often watched, transfixed, as they descended from the train, shivering in clothing inadequate for the fierce Manitoba winter. They huddled together in silence on the open sleds pulled by teams of four horses, on the last leg of the journey into the snow-filled icy mists of the mountains.

Whenever I gave voice to my fears and apprehensions about moving, the family bombarded me with phrases like: "You will soon learn to love living in the city. Grandma and Grandpa are there, and what about your cousins? We can go to the movies and public libraries! You'll meet other Jewish children."

These entreaties fell on deaf ears. All I wanted was continuity and familiarity. However, the wheels had been set in motion. September, the month set for our departure, arrived in all its fall glory. The mountains, now tinted in watercolor hues of purple and blue, looked more beautiful than ever. But nature's poignant beauty only served to accentuate my own despair at this upheaval.

How I would miss the skating carnival held on a rink lit by the lights of the Aurora Borealis; and our store at Christmas, lit up like fairyland with tinsel and toys. Every year, the school held a Christmas Cantata. The previous year, I had played the part of a Japanese princess.

Although everyone knew that, as Jews, we did not celebrate Christmas, we were invited to view the tableaux at the Anglican church, and when Santa Claus handed out presents to all the school children at the town hall, there was always a gift for me, too. I knew, of course, that it came from my father's store, and that there was no such thing as Santa Claus.

I had always gazed wistfully at the Christmas trees and decorations around us, but never asked nor expected that we would have our own. I was well aware that we were not really a part of this holiday or any other Christian holiday. We were "foreigners," tolerated by politeness and kindness by our British immigrant neighbors. It seemed to me, that in my short life, we always were sitting on the outside – on the periphery of happenings – wherever we were, be it here in town with our Christian friends or in Winnipeg with our Jewish family. At times it was a lonely place to be. But the thought of the city held worse terrors. In Kelwood, we had space, streets, gardens, cats, dogs, and the privilege of knowing every single person in town. The city was unknown quantity – overwhelmingly large and impersonal.

The fateful moving day arrived and we departed in our huge green Nash to conquer new frontiers. This was not like any other visit we had ever made; now there would be no coming back. There were no words to comfort me. Nor did I believe any of the admonitions that I would learn to love the city. Depression enveloped me like a cloud and it would not lift for sometime to come.

The landscape of the city struck me as being dreary and noisy after the quietness of country living. The houses seemed small and crammed together. My father, totally immersed in starting a new business, was seldom home and even then was preoccupied. My mother, too, was busier and home less often, as she was now living in the bosom of her own family. My sister was involved with her new peer group and cousins her own age. The cousins my age were the wrong sex – boys who were off playing hockey.

It was soon December, and Chanukah was approaching. It had never been a significant holiday for us as it had always been the busiest time of the year in our store and we were never in the city at that time. My grandparents and great aunts and uncles who lived in Winnipeg would light the candles and dispense Chanukah gelt to visiting children.

Jewish scholars today describe the history of Chanukah as a confused and convoluted story, but the one theme that has emerged, and has been passed on to our own children, is the triumph of the Maccabees in restoring the temple and the miracle of the lights, where one night's oil magically burned for eight.

It was during this period that a school friend, a particularly sweet-faced and pleasant girl named Annie, handed me an invitation to a Chanukah birthday party. Annie had, in many ways, appointed herself my mentor in learning city ways, and although filled with trepidation, I began to anticipate the party.

I arrived at Annie's door on the day of the party to be greeted by a room filled with Jewish children who happily gathered me into their midst as if I were one of them. Annie's mother lit the chanukiyah, and to me, the lights seemed to glow with a very special brilliance. Here, one was not allowed to sit on the fence. We played games, sang songs that I did not know, but managed to pick up here and there. We dined on latkes with sour cream and apple sauce and birthday cake topped by 12 candles for Annie. Annie made a wish and blew out the candles, but the Chanukah lights shone on with a dream-like radiance.

That evening, as I walked the short distance home after the party, it seemed to me that the street had taken on a special glow. In many windows there were chanukiyot with candles burning to commemorate the start of the Chanukah holiday. With a sense of elation, I now knew that they shone for me, too. I had found a new community. I knew that a kind of miracle had occurred. The city would become my new home.

The depression and fear I had experienced since moving vanished and I was free to perceive Winnipeg with fresh eyes.

My friend Annie did not live to see another birthday or Chanukah. She succumbed to leukemia. But the Chanukah candles continued to shine in the window of her home as a tribute to her for many years to come.

Every Chanukah I think of the Herculean task it took to restore the temple, and the courage and faith that is sometimes necessary to go on living. When the candles are lit, I know that miracles can happen.

CHANUKAH

The days of dreams have come with lots and lots of joy
Spinning dreidels everywhere and latkes flipping in the air
That's the Holiday I like

The lit flame of the shamash was high in the air and eight other candles shining right over there
That's the Holiday I like!

When the dreidel spins all day and the children like to play and many presents coming our way
That's the Holiday I like!

It's Chanukah!

Chanukah party in postwar Germany

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

The glow of Chanukah candles often rekindles memories of past celebrations, both joyous and poignant.

For Richard Goldberg, or Mickey as he is known to family and friends, the festival of lights, evokes memories of postwar Germany and the Chanukah party he and other Canadian Jewish servicemen organized in 1945 for a very young group of Holocaust survivors.

Along with vintage pictures and letters laid out neatly on the coffee table of his Toronto condominium, were newspaper clippings, yellowed with age. Accounts of the servicemen's efforts to help the child survivors were reported in the Gazette and the Montreal Star in 1946.

Goldberg, a former Montrealer, recounted this story to The CJN, describing in vivid detail, events that took place more than half a century ago.

The story begins in June 1945, several weeks after VE-Day. Goldberg, a corporal in the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) and a member of the 126 Wing, the all-Canadian Spitfire unit, was stationed with his unit in "luxurious" German officers' quarters some 10 km outside of Hamburg.

Airmen came across tiny wooden shul

One day, he and fellow unit member, the late Sam Kirshner, ventured out to see Hamburg. The city had been bombed very heavily by the Allies, and the mass physical destruction was very evident.

The two airmen wandered through the city, and much to their astonishment, they came across a tiny wooden synagogue completely intact, he said. "We couldn't believe this little place had been spared from the bombings. Around it was all kinds of devastation, and this place had survived."

He and Kirshner entered the shul and found an elderly gabbai; neither serviceman spoke German, but Goldberg, fluent in Yiddish, was able to communicate with the older man.

Upon enquiring about Jewish survivors, they learned that of the 1,000 survivors in the city – many were non-German former concentration camp inmates – some 20 to 25 children from mixed marriages had survived the war in Hamburg. "Their [non-Jewish] relatives had managed to hide these kids."

Despite the risk of being court-martialled for fraternizing with the Germans, the two servicemen arranged to see the children, a rarity in Europe since most Jewish children did not survive the war; the following week they all congregated at the home of a Mrs. Shultz, Goldberg said.

"We met these children and we saw that they were desperate for food. We decided we had to help these kids."

All the servicemen were getting regular parcels of food, sent to them from their families in Canada, and so Goldberg and Kirshner determined that they would collect parcels from the 20 "Jewish boys" stationed with them and distribute them to the child survivors in Hamburg, Goldberg said.

He had Jewish contacts at the post office who would let them know when the other Jewish men got their packages from home, he said. "When Joe Blow got a parcel and he went to pick it up at the postal section I had been notified ahead of time. I was standing there waiting for him."

None of his fellow servicemen turned him down, Goldberg said, recalling that he and Kirshner had urged the men to ask their families, friends and community agencies to send more bundles of food and clothing.

Their appeals for food, particularly in Montreal, were eventually so successful, servicemen who had been sent two or three packages a months began receiving up to 30 parcels a week, Goldberg noted.

When they had gathered enough food bundles for 17 children – their ages ranged from 2 to 11 – Goldberg said he devised a plan to skirt the issue of fraternizing with the Germans: he asked the Protestant chaplain attached to the air unit to come along on the first delivery.

Describing the padre as a compassionate man "who knew how the Jews had suffered," Goldberg produced a letter, written by Chaplain

THE HOLIDAY CHANUKAH

Chanukah is lots of fun, inside the house or in the sun.
Spinning dreidels with my friends, the Chanukah fun just never ends.
Opening presents is so exciting, lighting the menorah watching it brightly.
Eating lots of Chanukah gelt. Eat it up before it melts.
Latkes always taste so good, just the way they always should.
Play with all my cousins and friends, because Chanukah is almost at its end.
Then we open a few presents more. The guests leave and behind them we shut the door.

Party held for 'adopted' kids

Frank Harback in 1945, outlining the charitable activities of the unit's "Hebrew personnel."

With this letter of authorization in their possession, Goldberg said he and Kirshner felt they were protected from being court martialled, and thus free to carry on with their food distribution.

The letter even emboldened them to slip into Denmark from time to time to purchase – on the black market – milk and butter for the children, when those commodities were unavailable in Germany.

With Chanukah approaching, Kirshner and Goldberg decided to throw a Chanukah party for their "adopted children."

Mrs Shultz offered her home as the venue, and she also volunteered to do baking, but there was a problem; she had no ingredients for the cakes. So Goldberg and Kirshner turned to their Jewish contacts in the mess hall to get what they needed, and then smuggled these supplies off the airbase.

"And we did something very, very funny. To this day, I still laugh when I think of it," Goldberg said with a chuckle.

"The battle dress tunics were bulgy all round...We had eggs, sugar and flour inside our tunics, and here we were travelling in the back of a truck going to Hamburg, and standing with our arms wide-spread, our elbows up so we would not bump into each other and break the eggs."

He said despite the bumpy ride and their primitive packing methods, and Kirshner did not break a single egg.

The children's Chanukah party, which drew some 40 people – in addition to 20 children, were some of their parents, a few other Jewish servicemen, and the gabbai– "was the first party many of these kids ever experienced," Goldberg said. "the younger ones did know what a party meant."

He said that Mrs Shultz had a menorah and so they were able to light Chanukah candles, and one of the parents, a violinist, provided the entertainment.

Goldberg said the memories of that Chanukah celebration will remain with him forever. Weeks later, he was repatriated back to Canada. Kirshner, the last of the occupational unit to leave Germany, continued the food distribution for another six months until his return to Canada.

Goldberg said he often wonders what became of those children in Hamburg. "I wish I had kept in touch with them."

Chanukah

Hurray! I shouted out loud
Today is Chanukah the day
To be proud.
I put on my clothes and got in The van, I saw cousin Ron and Aunti Pam.
We asked grandma to tell us a tale
Of the Jews who fought and didn't fail.
"Alright," she said as she gave out the gifts,
I got a yo-yo David got a ship.
"Time for dinner," mother said,
"We will have latkes and soup and bread."
"Time for dreidels," round

They'll spin and spin and

Happy Chanukah

CHANUKAH

A dreidel, a dreidel – a little one on my knee
That's what Chanukah means to me
Little ones – friends – family get together
Greetings – loving which couldn't be better
Lots of goodies, sweet for the sweet,
Acts of kindness – a special treat!
Loving and caring, a thought for others,
The whole world becomes our sisters and brothers
Bitterness and strife throughout the year
In the glow of Chanukah soon disappear
Candles brighten – troubles lighten
Happy laughter, ever after!
Chanukah – a time for joy
Let us celebrate – "Utazoy!"

A festival of lights – you say?
We need those lights to light our way
From early age to where we are,
At any age, – they're our bright stars
Which lead and guide us through our years;
Through joy, gladness, strife and fears.
This shining holiday comes to mind
As we reflect on good deeds we find
And also good things that come about
While we pursue our daily route
And celebrate life's wondrous dreams
Of family, friends; of loving scenes.
A toast to all who celebrate
Chanukah! Chanukah! – I can hardly wait!

TO LIGHTEN OUR LIVES

You've stood in wait
all seasons long,
Menorah now resplendent.
Eight colored candles,
wick's afire,
reflect brilliance
in children's eyes, as each in turn brought flame to flare.

Joyful songs, tradition aged, praise tales of steadfast Maccabees.
Of Ner Tamid's constant glow, which guards the Ark
where wisdom dwells.
The Torah which designs our lives.

Chanukah gelt and dreidels spin delight young Jews who celebrate this festival of constancy.
The undefeated strength of faith.
The power of resourcefulness.

Slowly rainbow without its arch sheds tears of wax that it must wait
the twelve long months to re-ignite,
its tale determination breeds.
That everlasting peace arrives.

Architect helps to restore famed Krakow shul

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The first time Sam Gruber stepped inside the Tempel Synagogue in Krakow, Poland, he was "incredibly moved" by what he saw.

A consultant on Jewish heritage for the New York-based World Monuments Fund (WMF), Gruber had seen the Tempel from the outside in 1990, but had not been permitted to enter. Even so, judging only by the elegant but dilapidated facade, he had considered it one of the most impressive buildings in the famed historic district of Krakow-Kazimierz—a UNESCO world heritage site.

Considered the lone surviving example of the great 19th-century synagogues of Poland, the sumptuously decorated Moorish-Gothic structure had been built by a Reform congregation in 1862. Used by the Germans as a stable during World War II, it had been closed almost continuously since 1945.

Hearing in 1991 that the Tempel would be opened for a gala concert, Gruber rushed back to Krakow to attend. Stepping inside, he was awed by the elaborate wall paintings, the curtained ark, the Hebrew inscriptions, the women's balcony, the perfect symmetry of stone columns and Romanesque arches. All these elements seemed resplendent, albeit badly in need of repair and restoration after so many decades of neglect.

"I was amazed," he recalls. "The acoustics were wonderful. It was so moving to be in this place which had been closed and locked and empty for so many years. Now to see it suddenly filled with people and springing to life...I was overwhelmed."

The next day, he met with local Jewish communal representatives, who urged him to restore the building through the WMF's Jewish heritage program.

Since such a task has more to do with raising funds than raising scaffolds, Gruber began searching for donors. It took two years before a Houston philanthropist offered $30,000 (US) for a new roof. While only a fraction of the roughly $850,000 that the project was estimated to require, the gift nonetheless established a momentum that has attracted more substantial grants from the J. Paul Getty Trust, the European Union and others.

About 60 percent complete

The restoration is presently about 60 percent complete and continues on a phased basis, with another $150,000 required for completion. In November, scaffolding came down in the building's interior, revealing the newly cleaned ceiling; work is scheduled to begin soon in the apse, behind the lavish ark wall.

Beyond its importance to the local community, the Tempel is expected to provide a fitting prayer setting for Jewish groups that stop in Krakow enroute to Auschwitz and elsewhere.

More than anyone, it is Gruber, 42, an architectural historian living in Syracuse, N.Y., who is credited with turning around the fate of this project – and numerous others of Jewish provenance.

"Sam has worked tirelessly and against tremendous odds to advance the goals of the Jewish heritage project," says WMF vice-president John Stubbs. "He had to battle tremendous skepticism. People felt it was too massive a task, that it couldn't be done. They would ask, 'Where are you going to start?' and 'How are you going to do it?' Most of the likely supporters were more interested in the living culture than in restoring the old buildings. Sam has been able to show by doing, not just by talking and research. He's been able to show the doubters that it's possible to accomplish great things."

Besides the WMF, Gruber is a key player in the privately funded International Survey of Jewish Monuments (ISJM) and the United States Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad. These organizations have jointly conducted surveys of Jewish sites in Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary, Belarus, Ukraine, Turkey, Tunisia, Egypt, India and elsewhere. Gruber credits a variety of geopolitical factors, such as the new ease of travel in former Soviet-bloc countries, for making conditions in the 1990s highly favorable for this type of work.

The WMF has scored many outstanding research accomplishments in the 1990s, often in locations that would have seemed improbable in the 1980s. Robert Lyon, a New York Times photographer, snapped photos of several synagogues while travelling in Syria in 1995, and later showed the results to Gruber. Excited at seeing images of synagogues that few outsiders had seen before, Gruber commissioned Lyon to go back and shoot more. Lyon

The Jewish heritage program of the World Monuments Fund (WMF) relies upon private contributions in order to carry out its important task of restoring endangered Jewish monuments around the world. For its day-to-day operational expenses, the program relies upon an annual $100,000 grant from the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation.

The Lauder Foundation's five-year commitment has allowed the program to concentrate on raising funds on restoration projects such as the Tempel Synagogue in Krakow (described in the first article in this series).

managed to photograph 18 other synagogues before being asked to leave the country.

In Morocco, a WMF research team visited 80 cities and towns, documenting nearly 300 buildings, cemeteries and Jewish quarters. One product of that intensive effort has been an archival-quality set of 600 photographs of Moroccan synagogues that has been deposited in major libraries and institutions in Washington, New York, Jerusalem, Casablanca and other cities. The WMF has also published an abridged report, The Synagogues of Morocco: An Architectural and Preservation Survey, by Joel Zack, with photographs by Isaiah Wyner.

Another survey of Jewish cemeteries in Poland has proven invaluable for genealogists and others planning heritage-related trips there. Such a project would have been almost impossible, Gruber says, before the collapse of communism in 1989.

"The openness of the former Soviet Union is revealing amazing collections and monuments that weren't destroyed. And new opportunities have also opened up in North Africa and the Middle East, because it's now possible to conduct Jewish-related research projects in places like Morocco, Egypt and Tunisia. We're just beginning to scratch the surface in these places and we're just amazed to see what is still there: not everything was taken to Israel, not everything was destroyed. There's never been a better time to be doing this in the last 50 years."

With Gruber's guidance, the WMF has identified hundreds of endangered Jewish heritage sites around the world, and published a prioritized list of ten synagogues in immediate need of rescue. Besides the Tempel, WMF restorations have commenced at the Etz Hayim Synagogue in Hania, Crete, and the Paradesi Synagogue in Cochin on India's exotic Malabar coast.

Working with groups of local volunteers, Gruber also helped stimulate support for the restoration of the Pfaffenhoffen synagogue in the Alsace region of France, the only extant example of a pre-1800 two-story non-monumental synagogue, a type once common throughout Europe. He also spurred action on the Great Synagogue of the Boskovice Ghetto in the Czech Republic, a neo-Gothic structure whose interior was once covered with richly painted scenes, folk homilies and religious texts; the restoration is now about 75 per cent completed.

The WMF's 10 most-endangered list also includes a 1795 baroque synagogue in Mad, Hungary; the 17th-century synagogue associated with Rabbi Shlomo Ibn Danan in Fez, Morocco; a historic and architecturally significant 400-year-old synagogue in Pinczow, Poland; and the 1902 Subotica Synagogue in Serbia-Montenegro, which reflects a traditional Balkan Byzantine-Turkish design with many Hungarian folk motifs.

Although vitally required, these four restorations have been postponed until interested donors are found.

Sam Gruber, Jewish heritage consultant for the World Monuments Fund (WMF) and other organizations involved in conserving endangered Jewish monuments, lives with his family on a tree-lined residential street in Syracuse, N.Y., near the university campus.

Several blocks from his unexceptional white clapboard house, stands the elegant shuttered mansion that once housed the Jewish War Veterans, a building that Gruber is working with local activists to save. Others include the Onondaga County Poor House and the First Presbyterian Church in East Syracuse.

At 42, Gruber is well-known in Syracuse as a force in neighborhood preservation with a self-declared "passionate interest" in preserving heritage buildings of any sort.

Hours by car from any sizeable Jewish community, the attic of Gruber's home is the "mission control" for his ambitious rescue mission. The room is cluttered with books, files, scrolled architectural drawings and boxes of materials. Maps of Western Russia, the Baltics and Eastern Europe are pinned to the sloped dormer ceilings, some bearing stickpins as though a military campaign were under way. The desks and tables are buried beneath paperwork, layered like geological strata.

Gruber's bookshelves reflect the "explosion" of interest in Jewish heritage that has occurred in this decade. One of his favorite books of recent vintage is Konin: A Quest, by Theo Richmond. He is also partial to two guidebooks: Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to Central & Eastern Europe (1990) and Upon the Doorposts of Thy House: Jewish Life in East-Central Europe, Yesterday and Today (1994), written by his sister, Ruth Ellen Gruber. Stationed in Rome, Ruth Gruber is a foreign news correspondent and one of her brother's most valued researchers in the field.

Gruber's family has interest in heritage buildings

Gruber comes by his "passionate interest" in heritage buildings honestly. His father, Jacob Gruber, founded the anthropology department of Temple University in Philadelphia, where he is still professor emeritus. His mother, Shirley Moskowitz, is a well-known artist. As children, Sam, Ruth and a third sibling, Frank – now an entertainment lawyer in Santa Monica – often accompanied their parents on trips to Eastern Europe and elsewhere. "When I was 3 years old, I was out in the field, doing archeological work," Sam recalls. "From my father, I learned the type of methodical investigation that involves detailed description and careful analysis, which underlies my working method."

Gruber earned a PhD in architectural history from Columbia University in the mid-1980s, specializing in the Italian medieval period. Part of his studies involved a stint at the American Academy in Rome, where he won the prestigious Rome Prize in art history. He also holds a degree from Princeton. But he admits he knew little then about Jewish architecture. "I had visited every medieval and baroque church in Italy, and I knew papal history backwards and forwards, but synagogues just didn't seem terribly relevant."

In Rome, he met Philipp and Raina Fehl, founders of the International Survey of Jewish Monuments. In conversation, he mentioned that a great-grandfather had founded a synagogue in a small Texas town, and that a grandfather had founded another in southern New Jersey. The Fehls persuaded him to deliver a lecture on the synagogues of rural Texas, then another on those of South Jersey. More lectures followed, each of which required extensive research. Before long, Gruber had developed a growing reputation as an authority on synagogue architecture.

Coincidentally, the WMF had been seeking someone with precisely that expertise. In 1989, having just completed its first "Jewish" restoration, a synagogue in Venice, the organization was besieged with requests to rescue Jewish monuments. "Crazy as it sounds, with all the thousands of Jewish organizations in the world, there wasn't a single one devoted to saving Jewish sites," Gruber recalls.

The WMF hired Gruber to spend a year compiling a report on the status of Jewish monuments around the world. The task was "impossible," Gruber admits, and the report still isn't finished. Gruber also found it next to impossible, back then, to spark any enthusiasm among Jewish audiences for his newly declared mission.

"I'd give a lecture in a synagogue, and there would be a large hostile section of the audience. A lot of the questions would be negative with an accusatory tone. People would say, 'Why would you want to go to Poland?' or 'What is there worth saving?' or 'Jews never created any worthwhile buildings or art,' or 'Why would you want to do anything there where they destroyed us?'

"I would respond with arguments like 'There was a thousand years of Jewish history in Poland' and 'Clearly not all Poles were hostile to the Jews' and 'We have a responsibility to remember our history.' I made these arguments again and again."

Jewish institutions also seemed unwilling to recognize the necessity of preserving the material remnants of the Jewish past in Eastern Europe and elsewhere. "Synagogues would say, 'We can't save old buildings, we have our leaky roof to fix.' People weren't interested in saving Jewish heritage in the late 1980s."

In determining where to allocate their limited resources, WMF officials generally perform a sort of architectural triage, often fingering a site for restoration from a long list of candidates. The process was different for the Etz Hayim and Paradesi synagogues, however, since each of these buildings is "one of a kind."

Once the centre of Crete's Jewish community, the Etz Hayim Synagogue is the only surviving Jewish monument on the island. Constructed in the 15th century as a church in a modest Venetian-Gothic style, it was converted to Jewish use in the late 17th century. The Nazis deported Hania's roughly 200 Jews by ship in 1944, and then sank the ship. After the war, the synagogue was used as a chicken coop, and suffered considerable damage in a 1994 earthquake.

Until recently it was an abandoned ruin, and in 1996 the WMF declared that "it will probably not survive another ten years without timely intervention." Despite its common architectural style, Etz Hayim was an obvious candidate for restoration. About 60 per cent of the work has been accomplished to date.

The better-known Paradesi Synagogue of Cochin, which still receives worshippers on Shabbat, was erected in 1568 by Sephardic settlers from Europe. It is a square building with a gabled roof, a cupola and a clock tower with numerals in Hebrew, Roman and Malayalam. Inside, one finds white plaster walls, an intricately carved wooden ark, a curved brass bimah, a chamber filled with antique lanterns, and hundreds of distinctive blue-and-white willow-patterned Chinese floor tiles dating from the 1700s. The WMF survey described the synagogue as "one of the most beautiful in the world" but warned that numerous repairs were required "before neglect leads to serious damage."

Thanks to the organization's timely intervention, all but the Paradesi's picturesque bell tower has been restored.

In Poland, by contrast, endangered Jewish structures are plentiful enough that only a relative few can realistically be rescued.

"We can't save a synagogue in every town in Poland, simply because they didn't survive," says Gruber. "But we also can't do it even in towns where synagogues did survive. It's too much money and too much work, and there are too few uses for these structures. So we choose buildings that can be effective surrogates for all the ones that don't get saved."

A fundamental consideration for each restoration is the desired time period. Should the building be restored to the era when it was built, or to how it looked in a more recent era such as before the Holocaust?

"This is a decision that every conservator faces, whether it's a synagogue in Poland or Grand Central Station in New York," Gruber notes. "With Jewish sites the question is particularly acute, because the shadow of the Holocaust never leaves."

For Gruber, delicate esthetic questions like these form the pillars of architectural restoration. By preserving key aspects of our architectural past, he says, we preserve essential elements of our culture and history that might otherwise get eroded or bulldozed into oblivion.

"People ask me 'Why do you care so much about saving old buildings?' It's because architecture is a doorway into the past. Sometimes it's not the building itself that's so important but having something physical in front of you that forces you to confront another age.

"An old building transports you," he says. "It's a time machine. It takes you back into history."

ONE MENORAH

The night was filled with Christmas lights
On snowy nights
In small town rites,
And yet amidst this shining aura
One Menorah
Fought its way as though enchanted
That those in cities took for granted
One Menorah on Christmas nights
Never forgot the Feast of Lights.

The night was filled with Yuletide sweets
And family meets
In small town streets,
But just one family turned away
From Christmas Day,
And sang the songs of Maccabees
That those in cities sang with ease.
One small prayer on the Feast of Lights
Cracked the air of Christmas Nights.

The eve was filled with prayers from Missal
Dinners formal
Thought as normal,
But one house on its own volition
Kept tradition
From father to sons, to save their existence
That those in cities never knew the difference.
And during those long, cold frosty-nights
A family was blessed by the Feast of Lights.

How they write us

By MICHAEL GREENSTEIN

Canadian Jewish fiction got off to a late start: Henry Kreisel's The Rich Man was published in 1948, a few years before A.M. Klein's The Second Scroll (1951) and several years before Mordecai Richler's earliest novels.

All the more remarkable, then, that Gwethalyn Graham's Earth and High Heaven (1944) antedated all of these novels and won the Governor-General's Award, considering that it confronted anti-Semitic prejudice in Canada at a time when fascism was widespread and deep-rooted in so many parts of the world.

Graham sets her love story between Marc Reiser, a Jewish lawyer from a small town in Ontario, and Erica Drake, a journalist from a wealthy Protestant family in Montreal, during World War II. Throughout the novel Erica's father objects to his daughter's alliance with a Jew.

Perceptive and empathetic, Graham cuts through stereotypes. Here is how she describes Erica's first view of Marc: "The strange young refugee was tall and very slender except for his shoulders; he had slanting greenish eyes, high cheekbones, a square jaw, and to Erica, looked more Austrian than anything else."

Appearances can be deceiving, for Marc is Canadian-born, not an Austrian refugee, and with his greenish eyes, not "typically" Jewish-looking. Indeed, Graham's open-mindedness questions the very idea of racial identity, and ultimately puts Erica's father in the position of a refugee as his Westmount world collapses around him during the war – the war with his daughter as well as the international conflict.

This novel is about mixing: earth and high heaven, realism and a romantic love story, Christian and Jewish. The novel chronicles the development of Marc and Erica, and by extension, the maturing of Canadian society into acceptance and understanding of minorities.

In part because this is a novel about love at first sight, Erica's awakening to the question of Jewish identity is sudden. As soon as Marc tells her that he was unable to get an apartment on Côte des Neiges because they don't accept Jews in the building, Erica is taken aback by the revelation.

She remembers voices repeating phrases and statements she had heard all her life without paying much attention, because they were so tiresomely unoriginal. "The voices were talking against a background of signs which she had seen in newspaper advertisements, on hotels, beaches, golf courses, apartment houses, clubs and the little restaurants for skiers in the Laurentians, an endless stream of signs which ... until now she had never bothered to read."

Semitic and semiotic, these signs could be found in many countries in the '40s, but with the expansion of liberal democracy during the second half of the 20th century, most of these signs have been removed, at least outwardly.

For Charles Drake, Erica's father, the barriers against Jews will always remain. The anti-Semitic signs are an albatross around his neck, and the novel is as much about his opposition to a particular Jewish lawyer as it is about the love between Marc and Erica.

When it comes to prejudices, inconsistencies are to be expected. Marc explains to Erica that there isn't a single Jewish point of view. "You get Jews like Mr. Aaronson who are British imperialists, Communist Jews who are Russian imperialists, Jews who are Zionists, Jews who are violently anti-Zionist, Jews like me who are just Canadians or Americans or Englishmen."

The reverse side of this pluralistic coin is Erica's vision of how Marc appears to her father. "He always came out as a nightmare figure, a crazy conglomerate of a shyster lawyer, quick, insinuating, and tricky; a fat clothing merchant with a cigar in his mouth, employing sweated labor with one hand and contriving to outsmart both his competitors and the government with the other; a loud-voiced, flashy young man pushing his way up to the head of the queue; a skull-capped figure muttering incantations in a synagogue..."

Multiple stereotypes balance the portraits offered by Marc, as Graham creates realistic Jews alongside stereotypes. What emerges is a three-dimensional picture of the Jew viewed from various perspectives and through realistic lenses.

Erica's sister Miriam eventually meets Marc and has to adjust her

Earth and High Heaven

focus from category to individual. When she asks Marc if he is a realist, he replies that he is a "super-realist" – a term that might aptly describe Graham's super-realistic portrait of the Jew as super-realist.

In the final chapter of her novel, Graham enters the Yom Kippur service in Marc's hometown, Manchester, Ont. She intersperses verses from the service with narrative reflection on Marc's innermost thoughts. The resulting contrapuntal rhythm points to the polarities between earth and high heaven, between individual psychology and historic continuity, between particulars and universals.

Graham's narrator probes the religious spirit of Manchester's town hall at the sacred moment of Kol Nidre. "The dusty, commonplace, small town public hall was pervaded with a spirit of unity and faith which went back to the remote beginnings of this people in a country far away, and then returned, steadily broadening out until it had encompassed the world."

The shift in emphasis toward unity carries with it the risk of assimilation, for in the marriage of Marc and Erica, the question of Jewish identity remains unresolved.

With his fellow congregants, Marc recites, "His glory is above the earth and heaven." On the one hand, the title of the novel relates to this prayer; on the other hand, it derives from A.E. Housman's A Shropshire Lad: "Earth and high heaven are fixed of old and founded strong," and "high heaven and earth ail from the prime foundation." So the two lines highlight the novel's conflicted identity, oscillating between strength and ailing. The overlap of the Hebrew prayer and Housman's poem once again points to Graham's unitarian agenda.

Marc has warned Erica that marriage to a Jew will mean living in a kind of no man's land, that paradoxical space of a diaspora within a diaspora.

Ultimately what swings Marc in his decision to marry Erica is his older brother's approval. That David Reiser should be the final authority is rather unusual: he is a respected, compassionate and intelligent doctor; however, by remaining a bachelor in Ontario's hinterland, he himself negates the possibility of Jewish continuity.

David's stereotypically Jewish appearance is at odds with his non-Jewish existence; his dark features contrast with his "enlightened" views. David is very un-Jewish. For their discussion during the Day of Atonement, David takes Marc to a Greek restaurant.

For one who has been promoting a sense of unity and diversity, it is fitting that Graham places the crucial decision about the mixed marriage in the hands of someone who looks Jewish but takes an un-Jewish stance.

The resolution of the love story may seem too pat: Charles Drake's son dies in the war; so he finally accepts Marc. In the novel's final scene, Marc runs to Erica, who is standing by the barrier at the train station. That barrier will remain with them, and as often as they lift it, society will be there to remind them of its presence.

More than half a century has passed since the appearance of this ground-breaking novel. Where Graham was able to say that smaller towns were more liberal and democratic than cities like Montreal with its hierarchy, the situation has altered dramatically as urban space has become more ethnically diverse and many of the older structures have tumbled. The place of the cosmopolitan Jew in a postmodern, postcolonial world has shifted as the barriers have shifted.

Twenty years after Earth and High Heaven, Margaret Laurence's The Stone Angel was published. Laurence's longstanding friendship with Adele Wiseman colored her portrayal of Jewish characters.

Hagar Shipley, the protagonist of The Stone Angel, takes an instant liking to garrulous Mrs. Steiner, an elderly resident in the Manawaka hospital.

Laurence lets Mrs. Steiner speak directly in her own voice with a slight Yiddish inflection and with very little filtering through Hagar's narrative mind. "I was living before with Rita and her husband, and that was fine when they had only Moishe, but when the girl was born, where was the space? Here's Moishe and Lynne here – he looks the spitting image of his grandpa, my late husband, the same dark eyes. And smart. The smartest little trick you ever laid eyes on. Look at Lynne. A little doll, isn't she? A real little doll."

Jewish picture fully developed in The Diviners

Like Hagar, Mrs. Steiner is an elderly female outcast looking for space. Her grandson's name and dark eyes are markers of Jewish identity. Hagar examines the family photographs and sees two ordinary children playing on a teeter-totter. Laurence balances Mrs. Steiner's exaggerated sense of her "real doll" with Hagar's realistic sense of the ordinary; she goes Graham one step further in the process of "normalizing" the Jew in Canadian fiction.

A decade later, Laurence develops her Jewish picture slightly more fully in The Diviners (1974), where she writes about her years in Winnipeg and her affection for the Wiseman family.

Morag Gunn meets Ella Gerson in the office of the university's literary journal.

Ella's father had died several years earlier, and Mrs. Gerson runs a bakery to support her three daughters. "Mrs. Gerson is a tall strapping woman whose voice is brisk and bossy but also loving."

Laurence's balanced descriptions are matter of fact and to the point, without elaborate flourishes to take the reader outside of psychological reality. "Mrs. Gerson believes in God and Marx simultaneously, and is not dismayed by her daughters' suggestion of disparity in such a dual faith."

Laurence easily captures the outlook of Winnipeg's Jewish socialists and the warmth of the immigrant family. Mrs. Gerson's dual faith is precisely the reality that Laurence captures and balances to give an accurate picture of Jewish socialist life on the prairies.

A further 20 years separates Carol Shields' The Stone Diaries (1993) from The Diviners. Also set in Winnipeg, The Stone Diaries begins in the early part of this century so that, in contrast to Graham's contemporary context, Shields uses a distanced, double perspective spanning the entire 20th century.

Clarentine Flett wants to invite her neighbor, Mercy Goodwill, over for a pot of tea. Her reverie is suddenly interrupted: "She hears a voice, a man's high-pitched yipping, and looks up to see the old Jew stumbling toward her across the garden."

The narrator pauses to analyze the identity and representation of this character in an act of self-conscious historicism. "It's hard nowadays to talk about the old Jew. It's a tricky business. The brain's got to be folded all the way back to the time when the words 'old Jew' could be said straight out: old Jew; here comes the old Jew."

Shields repeats the phrase five times in as many lines as if to pin down and problematize the designation through confronting historical typing head on. In 1905, "the old Jew" carries the baggage of centuries; in 1993, the narrator, with a century of hindsight, deconstructs the original term, thereby making new our understanding. Not only does the old Jew stumble across the threshold of the prairies, but the new narrator stumbles through the parallels and thickets of the tricky business. Understanding comes from unfolding the brain and blurting out the epithet directly.

"And there he was with his dirty black clothes flapping in the heat, his hair all wild and strange about his head. He wears a hat of some kind, shredded and filthy and pushed to the back of his skull... The long eroded lines of his face are seamed with dirt, either that or it's the foreign taint of his skin."

As old as the representation of Jewishness itself, this dreaded figure at the beginning of the 20th century can only be presented in a politically correct manner at the end of the century by folding the modern brain backward. The true portrait lies between the folds of the narrator's and reader's brain, and the dirty folds of the foreign face. The old Jew is a dirty Jew, foreign yet familiar, dreaded yet welcome.

This wandering Jew is a prairie scarecrow, everything associated with him is tainted, his arrival is everywhere dreaded, he smells of garlic and onions. No one can determine his age, for he is ageless, a carryover from another century. He looks no person in the eye and calls up memories of Old World contagion.

After several paragraphs, a subtle shift begins. "A sore blackens his upper lip. Clarentine Flett, pulling herself away from him, feeling faint with disgust, is unable to take her eyes from that dried scab, which she unaccountably longs to reach out and touch."

This transition from repulsion to attraction seems inexplicable, but in humanizing the Jew, Shields moves from the grotesque to a more realistic mode. After registering his sore lip, Mrs. Flett observes his arm, which is an ordinary man's arm, not so different from her husband's arm. Once the extraordinary is rendered ordinary, the outsider can be incorporated into the family and body of humankind.

An old Jew at age 34

"She wonders – and all these images of hers crowd together in the space of a few seconds – wonders if the old Jew might possibly have relations somewhere in the neighborhood, a roof, a warm stove, a bed of his own to return to. If so, he might also have a woman's body next to his under the bedclothes, and a sack of loose blue flesh between his legs like every other man... And a name, of course he must have a name."

Centuries of stereotyping contract into seconds of insight addressing bed, body, name and a roof of one's own. To domesticate the nomadic figure is to normalize him, to name him is to provide him with some semblance of identity, and to sexualize him is to render him like every other man.

What unfolds is that the old Jew is on a nativity mission to bring Clarentine Flett to Mercy Goodwill, who is giving birth to a daughter. In this absurd annunciation, he serves as a kind of midwife.

The birth of the narrator also signals the birth of the old Jew's identity: "Another witness, wringing his hands most terribly and wailing loudly, is Abram Gozhdë Skutari, aged 34, known locally as the old Jew, a peddler of trinkets, born in the Albanian village of Priznen, the son of a Sephardic maker and trader of nails, who was the son of a professional scribe who was the son of a rabbi who was – the history (compiled by Skutari's Canadian grandson, and later published, McGill University Press, 1969) goes back to the 15th century..."

Shields "problematizes" the Jew's identity: his hand-wringing and wailing voice belong to the Shylock-Fagin tradition; but once named, Abram undermines our previous understanding of him as he is born into an oxymoronic world where the old Jew is only 34.

With his exotic name and lineage the old-young Jew spans the centuries in counterpoint to the Christian family tree presented at the outset of the novel.

Identity is further complicated by a 64-year leap into the future, where history is chronicled not by the narrator but by Abram's grandson, an assimilated Canadian.

In Chapter 2, Childhood, 1916, Abram reappears. After peddling door-to-door for years in rural Manitoba, he is drummed out of business by Eaton's mail order. He borrows money from the Royal Bank, "the first such loan made to a son of Israel." (Note how the designation has changed from old Jew to son of Israel as part of an ageless representation.)

With the money, he opens his own retail establishment on Selkirk Avenue in Winnipeg. Henceforth his customers will come to his door.

Abram plays an uncanny role in the life and death of the main characters in The Stone Diaries. The wandering Jew is both central and peripheral to the fate of the other characters who had misrepresented him.

Ann-Marie MacDonald's Fall On Your Knees has much in common with The Stone Diaries with its reliance on Jane Eyre and gothic regionalism. MacDonald's Jewish lady inhabits Cape Breton Island. Like the old Jew, Mrs. Luvovitz is implicated in a pregnancy, but Mrs. Luvovitz is a neighbor to the central characters, some of whom have Arabic ancestry. Hence the Luvovitz family is rendered far less exotic in comparison with the more Mediterranean Mahmouds and even the Irish Pipers.

"Mrs. Luvovitz had seen the pregnant woman sitting on the cliff's edge... People around here believed in kelpies. Mrs. Luvovitz's imagination had been infected. What could you expect with so many Catholics? They saw omens in everything. Where Mrs. Luvovitz came from they called them golems."

Rather than being the object of any narrative gaze, Mrs. Luvovitz herself does the gazing at a non-Jewish (but Semitic) woman who is far stranger than she is. Her husband, Benny, jokingly suggests that the pregnant woman might be a ghost. If the island is shrouded in superstition, then the Luvovitzes inject an air of realism, humanity and humor into the overwhelming gothicism of Fall On Your Knees.

As soon as Mrs Luvovitz spots the pregnant child, she exclaims in Yiddish, "Gott in Himmel," forgets about the ghosts and golems, and in a reversal of the usual determination of Jewish identity, tries to determine the motherless pregnant child's identity: "Was she Eyetalian? A Gypsy? What was the accent?"

Mrs. Luvovitz prepares tea and cookies for Materia Piper (née Mahmoud), her neighbor. The Jewish lady informs the Arabic child that the cookies are ruggalech. "It tasted strange and familiar all at once, cinnamon and raisins." That strange-yet-familiar recipe captures the flavor and essence of the ethnic mix on Cape Breton Island.

Mrs. Luvovitz understands Materia's predicament of being dead while alive, of being rejected completely by her family for marrying out of her faith.

Ultimately, Materia looks forward to her baby because she comes to love two of the Luvovitz children.

In addition to the female perspective, the male exchange between James and Benny is congenial. James approves of his "foreign" neighbors because they wouldn't consider it "strange" for him to be married to Materia. "Nothing really strange about the Jew except his accent, his black beard and curly sideburns and his little cap."

The chapter ends with James' thoughts: "Compared to Materia's family, the Luvovitzes seemed downright white." Through MacDonald's chromatic lens, even the black beard appears white.

With the outbreak of World War I, Mrs. Luvovitz's life changes when two of her sons are killed in battle, fighting the Germans, her own flesh-and-blood ancestry.

By 1929, Ralph Luvovitz with his sticking-out ears is the only surviving son, and Mercedes Piper falls in love with him, which creates a problem for the parents who contemplate the possibility of intermarriage. Instead he goes to Montreal.

By 1936, Mrs. Luvovitz no longer considered herself a German. "Mrs. Luvovitz looks at the sea and thinks, when did this become my home? When I buried Benny here? When the second war came? She cannot discern the moment. She just knows that every time she returns to Cape Breton, she feels in her bones, this is my home."

Canadian fictional representation of the Jew thus moves from outside to inside, from a central moral issue to peripheral characterization which is more atypical and less stereotypical. Coincidentally many of these Jewish characters are healers in an ailing society, but in the fictional process, the paraphysicians heal themselves with their house calls and homecomings.

CHANUKAH: THE FESTIVAL OF FREEDOM FOR MANKIND

Around the world are countries
Where evil rules the day
Where people are subjugated
And quietly put away

Each year when Chanukah comes
It reminds us of their fate
And how many years we were slaves
Until Israel came to be, in 1948

Human rights are fundamental
To every man, woman and child
That when the Menorah shines
It brings hope to those exiled

It tells them not to give up
For evildoers come and go
As in the story of Chanukah
Which happened long ago

The miracle of the burning lamp
Shows how the few can overcome
The wickedness of the many
When righteous deeds are done

THE CHANUKAH LAMP

She was naughty, punishment was laid by me.
No allowance for two weeks, no matter her plea.
Her resources were few, a dollar remained from before
To be used more than likely at the corner store.

Each day that passed, her punishment appeared too severe.
How to return, without losing face was my fear.
How much do you have left? I asked one day.
Still one dollar, she said, but not after today.

Why, what are you going to buy? I asked.
A Chanukah lamp, one that will be my task.
To light the candles and say a prayer,
And bless my family for being there.

Let me purchase the lamp. It will be the same.
You keep your allowance, let it remain.
She thought awhile, but shook her head.
No, Dad. I want it. I'll buy it instead.

The lamp in her possession, she entered the car.
I tried to persuade her before we had gone too far.

Last chance to return the money you had,
Buy something else, I said. She answered, no, Dad.

I want the lamp to be mine to keep.
To light, to clean and take with me in sleep.
I shrugged in defeat and said no more,
And drove home confused, but not sore.

Waiting for us at the door was Lori's mother.
Good news, she said. For dinner there will be another.
Your cousin is coming to celebrate with us,
The lighting of the candles, to sing and fuss.

Oh boy, my daughter said showing her pleasure.
I have a Chanukah gift that she will treasure.
A lamp that I just bought for me.
I'll give it to her, she'll love it, you'll see.

What matters not who is right or wrong,
When the wisdom of a child is so strong.
When words are said, as if from He above,
Knowing her tzedakah was a gift of love.

Clinton on rescue mission

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — President Clinton originally planned to visit Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas to celebrate the accomplishments of the Wye agreement.

But by the time he arrived in Israel on the weekend, it was clear to all the parties that his visit would focus on rescuing the accord from the latest welter of Israeli and Palestinian grievances.

During a joint news conference with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the president got a taste of the difficulties facing him. After the two met privately, Netanyahu vowed he would not cede another inch of West Bank land until the Palestinian Authority (PA) renounces plans to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state next May.

Chrétien to visit Auschwitz

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien will visit the site of the Auschwitz death camp during a week-long trip to Europe next month, The CJN has learned.

Chrétien will visit Auschwitz Jan. 24. He will become the first sitting Canadian prime minister to go there.

The PM will visit Poland, Ukraine, Germany and Switzerland from Jan. 23 to the 30th.

The trip was supposed to be a Team Canada economic mission, which was scrubbed. Instead, the prime minister will be on state business, a spokesperson said last week.

Cities on his itinerary are Warsaw, Krakow, Bonn, Kiev and Davos.

The News in Brief

CANADA

BBYO Addresses Hazing

WINNIPEG — The program director of B'nai Brith Youth Organization's (BBYO) Red River Region says the organization will soon spell out exactly what will be permitted at annual BBYO chapter induction ceremonies. The announcement came after allegations that a 14-year-old boy was "hazed" at a chapter induction last month. The boy's parents charged their son and his friend became sick after being forced to drink a spiked beverage.

Call To Fight Child Poverty

TORONTO — A coalition of social agencies and advocacy groups has called on the federal government to renew its fight against child poverty. Included in the Campaign Against Child Poverty are Jewish Family & Child Service, Mazon Canada and the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism. The groups want Ottawa to invest its budget surplus to help the 1.5 million Canadian children who live in poverty.

ISRAEL

Student Arrested

JERUSALEM — Palestinian police arrested a student who seized the weapon of an Israeli soldier beaten by a mob last week near Ramallah. The Beir Zeit University student turned himself in to Palestinian police and returned the weapon. He was released, but rearrested at the demand of the Israeli army.

Shabbat Court Ruling

JERUSALEM— An Israeli court has ruled that members of a kibbutz near Jerusalem can work on the Sabbath. The court said the day of rest for a collective organization such as a kibbutz could not be determined by outside religious bodies. The decision came in the wake of charges filed last March against six members of Kibbutz Tzora for working in kibbutz stores on Saturdays.

Palestinian Population

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is expected to triple by 2025. The increase, which hinges on the return of 500,000 Palestinians from abroad, would make the Palestinian population in the territories roughly 7.4 million.

WORLD

U.K. To Compensate

LONDON — Britain will soon unveil plans for a $41-million fund aimed at compensating Holocaust victims for assets confiscated by the government during World War II. Thousands of Jews from Germany and eastern Europe transferred their assets to Britain in the 1930s. When war broke out, Britain classified the moneys as property of the enemy and seized the accounts.

VW Makes First Payment

BERLIN — Volkswagen says it will make the first payments later this month from a $12-million fund it established to help slave laborers who worked there during World War II. Company officials have declined to say how large individual payments would be.

Hungarian Jews Protest

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Jewish leaders are protesting a government plan to cut one-time payments to relatives of Holocaust victims. The plan discriminates against Jews, charged Peter Feldmayer, president of Hungary's Jewish community. The plan, part of the government budget for next year, would reduce the payments to about $140 from the approximately $4,600 originally planned.

Soccer Probe Launched

ROME — Italy's soccer federation launched an investigation against two soccer teams after fans unfurled anti-Semitic banners at a recent match here. The two teams could face fines of the equivalent of $30,000. Meanwhile, a senior Italian politician suggested that soccer matches where fans display anti-Semitic or racist banners should be suspended.

Iranian Arrested

BUENOS AIRES — An Argentine anti-terrorist squad last week arrested an Iranian suspect here on suspicion that she was involved in the 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy and the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community centre. Nasrim Mokhtari is the only suspect currently under arrest for the attacks.

Rescheduling Sought

WASHINGTON — B'nai Brith has asked the governors of eight Rocky Mountain states to reschedule their presidential primary elections, which have been scheduled for Saturday, March 11, 2000. The group said observant Jews would be prevented from voting in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming.

UN Rips Israel

UNITED NATIONS — Non-Jews in Israel are treated as second-class citizens, a UN human rights panel said recently, adding that Israel's emphasis on being a Jewish state encourages discrimination. The panel was especially critical of the plight of the Jahalin, a Bedouin tribe it says Israel forcibly evicted from its ancestral lands to allow expansion of a Jewish settlement near Jerusalem.

Spielberg to Preserve Modern Yiddish Literature

AMHERST, Mass. — Brittle with age and crumbling, the world's largest collection of Yiddish literature is being given new life. The National Yiddish Book Centre here has announced it will receive $500,000 from Steven Spielberg's Righteous Persons Foundation to create a digital Yiddish library of 20,000 out-of-print, irreplaceable texts.

The project will use digital technology to permanently preserve works of modern Yiddish literature, which was nearly obliterated during the Holocaust. Similar technology was used in Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History project, which videotaped the eyewitness testimonies of 50,000 Holocaust survivors, rescuers and liberators.

Digitized books in The Steven Spielberg Digital Yiddish Library will be reprinted on demand, or alternatively issued as CD-ROMs, and made available via the Internet. Officials at the centre say this is the first time that virtually an entire modern literature will be preserved in digital form.

Spielberg gave $250,000 towards construction of the organization's permanent home in 1995.

UJA Federation winds up '98 campaign

Finishes with record $41 million in pledges

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After nearly a year of festivities, celebrations and hard work, UJA Federation is winding up its 1998 fundraising campaign with a record $41 million in pledges – $5 million more than last year.

Buoyed by a strong economy, a public recognition of the impact of government cutbacks on social services and a sales pitch that linked contributions to beneficiaries, the campaign racked up record numbers, UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English said. "We're well on our way" towards reaching a long-term goal of raising $50 million annually by the year 2001, he added.

This year's campaign attempted to clear up public confusion regarding allocation priorities. After consulting with about 250 donors and volunteer fundraisers, UJA Federation moved towards greater accountability to the people giving money while resisting an international trend towards designated giving, English said.

Of the additional $13.5 million expected by 2001 ($50 million less last year's total of $36.5 million), $6.5 million will go towards strengthening Jewish identity, $4.3 million towards assisting the vulnerable and $1.5 million towards the rescue of Jews around the world.

The 1998 record total is slightly more than the $40 million raised in 1989 and the $39 million accumulated in 1994, the campaign's two previous highs. This year's campaign marks the continuation of a trend that has seen Toronto's Jewish community consistently among top givers in North America, in both total numbers and per capita giving.

Los Angeles, with 519,000 Jews, is expected to raise $42 million (US) while Toronto's final total is similar, but based on a population base of only 175,000 Jews. Approximately 30,000 people contribute to the Toronto campaign though 75 percent of the funds come from contributors who give $10,000 or more. The campaign received several multimillion dollar donations spread over three years, English noted.

Although collecting the pledged sums is an ongoing process that takes months, the federation's community planning and allocation committee will meet sometime in the new year to begin the process of determining how the money will be distributed.

Last year, 55 percent of the campaign was directed to national and local agencies while 45 percent went overseas to the Jewish Agency through the United Israel Appeal. Of the funds received by the Jewish Agency, two-thirds went to the rescue of Jews in danger while the remainder was used for absorption of new immigrants to Israel, Jewish education in the Diaspora and helping Israel's needy.

Of local allocations, 15 percent went to national Jewish agencies such as Canadian Jewish Congress and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. The bulk of the domestic expenditures went to support Jewish education (through family subsidies or day school grants) and to social welfare agencies like Jewish Family and Child Service, Jewish Vocational Services, Circle of Care, Reena and the Bernard Betel Centre. Approximately 9.3 percent to the funds raised go towards administration and overhead.

"For the past three years, we've had a 45-55 split more or less between overseas and domestic allocations," English said. "Our ultimate goal is to get back to a 50-50 split."

In maintaining the current distribution ration, UJA Federation has resisted a North American trend towards greater domestic allocations. "Many federations believe campaigns would be more successful if they stressed local needs," English said. "The proportion we give overseas is among the highest in the world among federations.

"We also spend the highest proportion among all the federations on Jewish education.

"Toronto's community is positively unique in North America," English continued. "It's Israel-positive. It's a more Jewishly-cohesive community and more traditionally Jewish in its world view."

From the editor's desk

For the sake of Heaven

Last month I attended the 67th General Assembly of the UJA Federations of North America (GA). For the first time ever, it was held in Jerusalem. In the past weeks, I have used this space to reflect on some of my experiences at the GA.

One of the special pleasures and immensely gratifying benefits of attending the GA is having the opportunity to meet and to hear presentations by some of the great thinkers in the Jewish world.

Every day, each day, during the assembly, in seminar rooms, meeting rooms and lecture halls, there were countless "sessions" led by speakers and thinkers of considerable intellect and diverse backgrounds. Among that large group were a great many speakers with the rare ability to inspire their listeners.

On one of the days of the assembly, the conference planners organized eight concurrent noontime sessions during which participants were able to munch their lunch, study specific texts, and learn with, as the program notes described them, "master teachers."

The program notes were not an exaggeration.

Among the eight topics and sets of teachers were: Women's role in Judaism with Blu Greenberg and Naomi Ragen; The faith of biology and the biology of faith with Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz and Dr. Robert Pollack; Study the Torah and study it some more, for everything is in it with Rabbis Jerome M. Epstein, Haskel Lookstein and Sheldon Zimmerman; Secular and religious Israelis: a cultural war or a social charter with Prof. Avi Ravitzky and Ruth Calderon.

I chose to attend the session entitled Two strategies for Jewish survival: how to deal with their conflicts today. Three teachers were assigned to this session. But the one I wanted to hear was the renowned scholar Rabbi Irving Greenberg, president of Chaverim Kol Yisrael/Jewish Life Network.

Rabbi Greenberg, the author of The Jewish Way, is somewhat of a controversial figure in certain Jewish circles, due to his constant efforts to bring about more cooperation among Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements within Judaism. He is also the president of National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership (CLAL).

As in all the lunch and learn sessions, rabbinic source references were distributed to the hungry learners. The teachers referred to the materials to focus their presentations and to provide parameters for the discussions that ensued among the participants.

The sources for our session comprised three mishnaic references from the Talmud. I will only reproduce the first one, from Pirkei Avot.

"Any dispute which is for the sake of Heaven will yield positive results in the end; and any which is not for the sake of Heaven will not yield results in the end. What is a dispute that is for the sake of Heaven? This is the sort of dispute between Hillel and Shammai. And what is a dispute that is not for the sake of Heaven? It is the dispute of Korach and all his following."

This rabbinic definition of a dispute for the sake of Heaven became both the jumping-off point and the anchor for the discussions around our table. Rabbi Greenberg offered some guidance in our search for an answer.

"We are living through one of the greatest cultural revolutions of all time," he said. "The arrival of the open society has provided great benefits. And the Jews in particular have been the beneficiaries of this openness.

"We have achieved freedom, relative affluence and power. But in the process, we have lost our self-evidence." By that Rabbi Greenberg meant the beliefs that we had always held about Jewish life and that we had regarded as self-evidently truthful and appropriate.

"Is religion self-evident these days? Is even marriage self-evident?

"There no longer are any absolutes. Jews now have the freedom to choose to be Jews or not to be Jews. We must therefore devise strategies to help people deal with that choice," he stated emphatically.

"But how does one pass on religious values in an open society?"

Rabbi Greenberg answered his own question.

"There are two options: Absolutism, a return to fundamentalism, withdrawal from the larger community, segregation; or we can learn how to argue with each other with integrity and with passion but also with respect."

He obviously preferred the second option. "Is it possible," the rabbi asked rhetorically, "to see the other person as an ally even though we disagree?

"In the ancient past, when we received directives directly from God, we could make unequivocal decisions. But as the Talmud suggests, God no longer gives us direct answers; we should therefore try to use our own best efforts to arrive at solutions for the sake of Heaven.

"In this century, God has made it clear that human beings must intervene to 'save the situation.' Therefore, the 'other side' has the right to be heard and to be respected for participating," Rabbi Greenberg concluded.

For the sake of heaven, we would all do well to follow his advice.

Volunteers, CJC aid victims of Hurricane Mitch

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "If we Jews don't have empathy, then who does?" asks Franci Williams, standing before a pile of clothes, toys and medicines bound for the victims of Hurricane Mitch in Honduras.

Williams and her husband Charles Moses left for the stricken country this past Tuesday on a two-week mission of mercy organized by Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

The volunteer couple took thousands of dollars worth of goods and supplies, including toys for Christmas and Chanukah. They'll spend a good part of their trip with members of the capital's 40-family Jewish community, whose synagogue was wiped off the map by raging floods and mud.

Williams and Moses will be staying at a church-run orphanage in the capital, Tegucigalpa. About 50 toys for the orphans were donated by Leaside United Church, while dreidels and other Judaic items for Jewish children came from Israel's bookstore.

As well, the couple took $5,000 worth of painkillers, anti-fungal creams and other medicines donated by Map International, a Canadian non-profit group. Small toys were donated by Dennis Klein of the A Buck or Two dollar stores.

Hurricane Mitch killed an estimated 11,000 Hondurans and rendered some 1.6 million homeless.

Earlier this year, members of the capital's only synagogue, the Comunidad Hebrea de Tegucigalpa, made the final payment on the small shul, and installed a bimah.

Last month, Mitch destroyed the building and everything in it, save for a sefer Torah that was found beneath some mud. Although soiled, it was in good shape.

According to reports, synagogue members have been working to help fellow Hondurans find food, water, shelter and kerosene. Congregants have also been collecting mattress pads for displaced Hondurans to sleep on.

Williams, a volunteer for Ve'ahavta, said she was motivated by Jewish social values.

"I believe that to be a Jew is to be involved in tikkun olam," she told The CJN prior to leaving. "It's the definition of being Jewish, and of being human."

Williams and Moses are paying a part of their travel expenses, with the rest picked up by Ve'ahavta. The organization was established a year ago to help victims of disease and disaster the world over, and to re-awaken the traditional Jewish commitment to alleviating suffering.

Also last week, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) seized on a news story which said that more than 3,000 boxes of boots, sleeping bags, used clothes and toys destined for disaster victims in Central America were piled up in a Montreal warehouse because there was no money to transport them.

CJC used $13,000 from its Hurricane Mitch fund, which has raised $19,000, to transport the supplies to Honduras.

Last Thursday, CJC president Moshe Ronen traveled to Ottawa to present a cheque to Honduran consul general Sophia Cerna. The 50,000 pounds of supplies are scheduled to arrive within the next week or two.

Ontario passes Holocaust bill

TORONTO — Ontario's legislature has unanimously passed third and final reading of Bill 66, the Holocaust Memorial Day – Yom Hashoah Act.

When it becomes law, after receiving royal assent, the bill will establish Ontario as the first jurisdiction in North America to have an official day on which to commemorate the Holocaust and genocide.

The day will take place on Yom Hashoah, in accordance with the Jewish calendar.

The bill was introduced earlier this year by Ted Chudleigh, the Tory MPP for Halton North.

It is also expected to enhance Holocaust education and awareness in Ontario.

The bill was passed last Thursday, on the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

McGuinty expresses support for school funding

TORONTO — Opposition leader Dalton McGuinty told Ontario's Jewish leadership that he has no ideological opposition to ensuring public funds support Jewish day schools. It is believed that this is the first time any provincial party leader has made such a declaration.

Speaking to an executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), McGuinty did point out that his first priority would be to re-inspire confidence in public education.

"When we talk about schools in the Jewish community, we cannot do that in a vacuum," he told the meeting in the Lipa Green Building. "There are many other groups. We are talking about a substantive change in the way that we fund public education in Ontario. I cannot do that until we first inspire confidence in public education."

He was the second provincial party leader to address the CJC executive on public policy issues. Premier Mike Harris is scheduled to speak to Congress on Jan. 21.

McGuinty discussed public funding of Jewish education in response to a question from Rabbi Jerry Unterman, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation. The rabbi said that the Opposition leader had spoken "movingly and ethically about education, yet government after succeeding government in this province has treated the Jews as second class citizens despite the fact that we pay taxes like everyone else does, and we support the public school system.

Ontario Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty (centre) with CJC, Ontario region, chair Keith Landy (right) and executive diector Bernie Farber prior to McGuinty's address to the CJC's executive meeting.

"We do not have one penny from the government in terms of the Jewish day school system in which 11,000 of our children are being educated – a system of benefit to not only the Jewish community, but the entire community," said Rabbi Unterman. "Are you going to support the end of this discrimination and this immoral behavior, and the giving of government subsidies to Jewish day schools?"

In response to a question regarding the decline of anti-racism education in the province, McGuinty asserted that the Liberals are firmly committed to a curriculum that, in part, is designed to control racism, and that "the Holocaust is a powerful, tragic experience that is important to all humanity. It would be a terrible mistake for us not to ensure that our children learn from that experience."

McGuinty was accompanied to the meeting by Greater Toronto Area Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter, Mike Colle and David Caplan.

"The government does not owe people a living or a job, but I do believe the government owes each and every Ontarian an opportunity," he said. "Opportunity in its most important form is education… We're going to have to re-establish a good working relationship between governments, school boards, teachers, and parents."

He stressed the need for more junior kindergartens, and the availability of adult education in the province.

Neal Goldstein, co-chair of Congress's political liaison committee, expressed CJC's appreciation for McGuinty's remarks, and his support of Bill 66 declaring an official Yom HaShoah Day in the province.

In his report to the meeting, CJC chair Keith Landy spoke of the first-ever regional officers' meeting outside of the Greater Toronto Area, in Kitchener. "There was a commitment I made that Congress would spread its wings and be more inclusive – more understanding that Ontario does not end at the borders of Toronto."

Regional executive director Bernie Farber reported that the region sent a letter of complaint to the Ontario Press Council following protracted discussions with the Globe & Mail regarding a memorial notice printed on June 6, 1997 indicating that Rev. Dr. Solomon J. Mattar, "a gentle man and Christian Martyr was 'executed' by Israeli soldiers on June 6, 1967."

"We have done an intensive investigation, and have found no proof that Dr. Mattar was executed by Israeli soldiers on that date, nor have we uncovered any evidence as to his death," said Farber.

CJC's hoped-for conclusion to its complaint is that the Globe & Mail undertakes an intensive investigation into who placed this notice. If they are unable to substantiate it, a proper retraction must be printed, said Farber.

"A significant system to appropriately safeguard against such future manipulative items would also be necessary to maintain the integrity of this venerable publication," he said.

Israeli researchers work to ensure water supply

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is running out of water due to the twin pressures of population growth and industrialization, an Israeli scientist warns.

And, he adds, Israel's thirst for water will double within about 40 years.

Despite these stark scenarios, Israel stands "a good chance" of meeting its increasing needs, provided research funds are available, said Charles Linder, a water management expert from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Here to inform the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University about advances in water management techniques, Linder broadly described the projects he and his colleagues are currently working on to head off disastrous water shortages in Israel.

• They are adapting current technology to minimize waste generated by desalination and water recycling.

• They are improving membrane filtration processes, a system of reverse osmosis.

The overall objective is to improve water quality and lower its price, he explained in an interview.

"Many of these systems are now going into the pilot stage and are being taken to the field for testing," disclosed Linder, a polymer chemist who specializes in water purification, desalination, waste management and membrane filtration methods.

Still other projects are in the development phase in the laboratory.

Linder said that the research being carried out at the university's Centre for Water Science and Technology, of which he is a member, can be applied to extracting brackish water from the Negev, and desalinating water from the Red Sea and the Mediterranean Sea.

Citing statistics released by Israel's Water Commissioner's Office, Linder said that Israel currently has access to 1.9 billion cubic metres of water per year from natural sources, but in fact uses 2.1 billion cubic metres.

The shortfall is made by up recycling waste water.

But in the next century, Israel will require far more water for human consumption, agriculture and industry.

At present, Israel pumps most of its water from the Sea of Galilee, wells and aquifers. The rest is acquired from reservoirs of brackish water and through desalination, an expensive process.

Linder, a graduate of Brooklyn's Polytechnic Institute, said that Israel is way ahead of Arab countries in terms of water management because of its much larger pool of scientific and technical personnel.

However, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, assisted by American and European companies, are the region's leaders in desalination.

"The price of desalinated water there is not a concern," he said. "Israel is not in that position."

Linder predicted that water shortages in the Arab world, notably in Jordan and Syria, will worsen in the years ahead.

This could fuel calls for a holy war against Israel, he said.

Water scarcities in the arid Middle East could therefore sow instability and touch off so-called water wars.

"Without water, neither Israel nor the Arabs can develop economically."

Prior to the 1967 Six Day War, the competition for the waters of the Jordan River aggravated tension between Israel and Syria.

In the future, Israel and the Palestinians may also be at loggerheads over water supplies, since two of the three main aquifers on which Israel depends lie largely under the West Bank, coveted by both sides.

Concerned by potential water shortfalls, Israel and the Palestinians have discussed the issue in bilateral and multilateral talks.

Linder, who was previously associated with the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, advised Israel not to rely on fresh water from its current ally, Turkey.

"No one knows what the political situation in Turkey will be like in 10 years."

While here, Linder met with local officials responsible for Toronto's water resources and waste water management.

They reached an agreement to continue ongoing cooperation and maintain an exchange of information and technology.

Metro wants to eradicate its annual summer problem of foul smelling and distasteful water. Linder promised to help Toronto deal with it.

Are there more miracles?

These words are being written on the first night of Chanukah. We lit the candles and sang the traditional songs recounting the great heroism and the many mysterious miracles that took place at this time so very long ago in and near Jerusalem.

Are there any miracles left for today?

The question is hardly rhetorical.

As of this writing, President Bill Clinton is on his way to Gaza to take part in a special meeting of the Palestine National Council (PNC), where, it is hoped, he will preside over the revocation of the odious provisions of the PNC charter mandating Israel's destruction. Even now, merely hours before the meeting, it is still not known how, or whether, the members of the PNC will be voting on the matter.

What should have been an entirely celebratory occasion has now become yet another tense and caustic flashpoint between the Palestinians and Israeli leadership, neither side trusting the other, both sides making sharp declaratory statements further feeding an overstuffed sense of distrust and disbelief.

The Wye River accord of seven weeks ago is increasingly slipping into nothing more than a fading memory of a successful photo opportunity. The lofty words and noble sentiments expressed by all the leaders there before the world's network cameras have crashed against the rocks of Palestinian duplicity and disregard of contractual commitments.

Dissatisfied with the first set of prisoners released from custody by Israel under the terms of the Wye Accord, the Palestinians resorted to their favorite formula of registering protest: rioting and stone-throwing. They are tired Palestinian tactics, but still dangerous nevertheless, the primitive, uncivil, tribal stimulus to the predictably punitive response.

Into this violent vortex of the crumbled Wye, the troubled American president brings his good office and friendly counsel.

Are there any miracles left?

Iran's new recruits

Reports surfaced in the mainstream international media last week that Iran has been attempting to recruit scientists from the former Soviet Union to help it develop its own biological germ warfare capabilities. The intelligence community has long known of this unique Iranian job creation program. That the story found its way into the general media is probably an indication that the government in Tehran is redoubling its efforts to find and buy willing scientists.

According to a report that appeared in the National Post last week, "Iranian officials who report directly to the country's leaders have approached dozens of Russian scientists" expert in assembling germ weapons, offering them up to $5,000 a month for their expertise and loyalty.

Given the state of the current economic chaos in Russia, it is not surprising that the Iranian rulers would post their help-wanted ads in Moscow. For most Russians, $5,000 far exceeds their annual salary, let alone their monthly stipend. The monetary offer, therefore, is a temptation, to which one assumes most would succumb.

If reports are to be believed, however, most of the scientists are resisting the promise of Iranian wealth. Only five Russian scientists could be confirmed as having gone over to the Iranian laboratories.

This Iranian mischief warrants close watching. Germ warfare capability is not acquired for defensive purposes. It is, rather, offensive in the deepest sense of the word.

So too is the Iranian behavior.

No Shoah survivors in Canada's delegation

Are Holocaust survivors the only people to find it strange that 53 years after the end of World War II, and with many energetic survivors still contributing to society, Canada and the Canadian Jewish leadership still found ways to send a delegation to the Nov. 30 to Dec. 3 Washington conference on Holocaust restitution without appointing even one single Shoah survivor as a member? (CJN, Dec. 4)

It's as if a lawyer or notary would invite everybody to the reading of a will, except family members of the deceased.

Holocaust survivors are not going to be around forever. There is no time like the present for Canada to take off its blinkers.

Ezekiel Hart did not take seat

I want to correct an error in your article concerning my new book with Desmond Morton, Who Speaks for Canada? (CJN, Dec. 3).

Though Ezekiel Hart died in 1843, the act passed in 1832 by the Lower Canada Assembly allowing Jews to hold office was not passed to enable Hart to take his seat, won twice earlier in the century. After he was rebuffed again by the Assembly in 1809, Hart did not run a third time.

Up to men to stop violence against women

The letter by Nathan Garnick on spousal abuse (CJN, Dec. 3) glossed over a very serious situation. The writer stated that male muscle can become life threatening and that a woman's sharp tongue-lashing can be as castrating as a surgeon's knife, concluding that "a blow may sometimes be less wounding than a verbal diatribe."

Allow me to share a few points regarding violence against women: According to the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women established by the Federal government in 1991: 51 percent of women have been the victim of rape or attempted rape; 27 percent of women have experienced a physical assault in an intimate relationship; 81 percent of sexual assault cases at the level of rape or attempted rape reported by women were perpetuated by men who were known to the woman.

In Quebec, close to 300 women were killed by men between 1990 and 1995.

Male violence against women must be recognized and dealt with. It is far too easy to criticize a sharp-tongued woman rather than recognizing the oppression and violence that the male gender regularly inflicts upon the female gender.

Every male must accept responsibility and look within himself to stop the violence against women. Quoting Yiddish, as Garnick has done, can be enjoyable and make us feel better, but it won't alleviate the situation of women.

Are tears for herself or grandson?

My husband and I were invited to dinner by a Chinese Canadian family who had been our neighbors for over a decade and had moved away to a different area. The guests were all known to us except one person. When the subject of grandchildren came up, this person asked questions of both families. He asked me how many grandchildren I had.

I dread this question, but answered honestly, "Two, we did have three. Shane was killed by a drinking driver five years ago." He was 17 at the time of his tragic death. This is hardly dinner conversation, so the subject was dropped.

Our hosts and their entire family knew the story and had supported us in many ways. I have tried to analyse my feelings in regard to this question. Are my tears for myself, perhaps because I feel I should have been taken and Shane spared? There are no answers for me, but nearing 80, I should be much wiser than I am.

A tale of living history

By FRED NARVEY

"Grandfather, is it true that you fought alongside the Maccabees?"

"Yes, Alexander," I answered. I looked at the child. He will soon be bar mitzvah. Why does my daughter have to dress him in a short tunic with his legs showing and with a band around his head? One can't tell a Jew from a Greek anymore!

The child sat down on the ground beside me.

"Why do you sit out here instead of in the house, grandfather?"

"Because I am not used to the houses in Jerusalem. I find them too cold for my 70-year-old bones. It was different in the town of Modin where I came from."

"Why did you come to Jerusalem?"

"Because the war is over. Simon, the only Maccabee to survive the war, has become the governor of Judea, and he might need me."

Judah Maccabee, as envisioned by a 15th century French painter.

"Were you there when Matityahu, the father of the Maccabees, killed the Jew for kneeling to the invaders' false God?"

"No, little one," I answered, "I was tending my father's sheep."

"When Matityahu's sons attacked the invaders and fled to the hills, was that the beginning of the revolt?"

"No. The trouble started much earlier than that. When Antiochus Epiphanes IV became king of the Syrian segment of the Greek empire and governor of Judea, he tried to impose the Greek culture on the Jewish people. The aristocracy, the rich merchants, and the priesthood in Jerusalem were beginning to adopt these new ideas: Hellenization, they called it. But the village priests and the peasants like me wanted to maintain our old traditions. First, we Jews argued with one another, then we came to blows."

My daughter, Naomi, came into the courtyard as I was talking. My daughter, my daughter, how she has changed! I thought. Her hair was piled high in Grecian fashion. She wore a long silk gown and her shoulders were bare. Was this the Jewish girl I raised in the little village of Modin? But her olive colored skin and fiery black eyes are as beautiful as ever. How could I help but love her?

"Alexander, please go into the house. I want to speak to grandfather," she said in Greek. Alexander obeyed.

"What have you been telling your grandson?" Naomi asked.

"Speak to me in our language, Aramaic!" I muttered.

She granted my request. "Alexander must not be set against his father. You are aware that I am married to a modern thinker. You can call Paul a Sadducee if you will, but he admires the Greek language, their art, philosophy and architecture."

"This is something that developed with affluence," I replied. "I seem to recall that Paul's name was Saul before he became a rich corn merchant trading with the Greeks, and Alexander's name was Amos."

Naomi ignored my remark. "My husband is a good Jew. He brings sacrifices to the Temple and helps to support the High Priest."

"Bringing sacrifices to the Temple and supporting the High Priest is cult worship!" I retorted. "What we need are rabbis (teachers) and synagogues where we can study, learn and worship God."

"Spoken like a Pharisee!" my daughter answered sarcastically. "You may worship as you please, but don't fill Alexander's head with your notions of resurrection of the dead, of a world hereafter, and of a Messiah!"

"I am proud to be a Pharisee," I answered.

"Don't forget that it was I, Efraim ben Kasriel, and men like me who fought on the side of the Maccabees and made it possible for people like you to determine your own way of life."

Naomi went back into the house without another word. I turned my eyes to heaven. Rebecca, my wife, thank God you have been spared this anguish!

Alexander came out of the house munching on a falafel and sat down on the ground beside me again. "Tell me about the Maccabees," he pleaded.

I waited for the pounding in my heart to subside. "They were five brothers," I began. "John, Simon, Judah, Eleazar and Jonathan. The first four were big, strong men like their father, Matityahu, the village priest of Modin. But the youngest, Jonathan, was quite delicate. We were neighbors in the village, and their mother, Sarah, was a good friend of my mother's. Sarah told my mother that Judah was a fighter even as a child. Matityahu gave him many a licking for throwing rocks. Jonathan, the youngest, was extremely clever and was his mother's pride and joy.

"When the revolt broke out against the Syrian tyrant, Antiochus Epiphanes IV, it was Judah who became the guerrilla leader. He was credited with delivering many hammer blows against the enemy. Eventually, Judah and his followers became known as the Maccabees, from the Hebrew word for hammer.

"Though Judah was known as the Hammer, Jonathan was known as the Fox. After fighting the enemy for 3½ years, Jonathan sent agents around the country to spread the rumor that uprisings were taking place in other parts of the Syrian/Greek empire (called the Seleucid Empire), and that Antiochus' throne was in jeopardy.

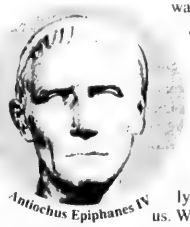
"Antiochus Epiphanes IV withdrew his harassed mercenary army from Judea, and Judah and his troops marched into Jerusalem."

"And that's when the miracle took place!" my grandson shouted.

"What miracle?" I asked.

"The one about the lamp in the Temple which only had enough oil for one day and burned for eight days!"

I patted his curly head. "Yes, little one, it is good to believe in miracles, but not to depend on them."



Antiochus Epiphanes IV

"And that was the beginning of the Chanukah festival!" Alexander shouted triumphantly.

"Yes, dear, but within a year, Antiochus' son, Antiochus V, returned to Judea with a vast army, including a troop of elephants. Judah suffered his first defeat, and the Maccabees had to flee to the hills once more. The struggle persisted for 25 years.

"Judah won many battles, but the war was won by Jonathan, the Fox. He pitted various pretenders to Antiochus' throne against one another, thus weakening them all. At last, the great powers of Greece and Rome, reluctantly recognized the State of Judea.

"But by the time the Jewish state was established, four of the five Maccabee brothers were dead. Simon, who is now our governor, was the only one to survive the war. Thank God he has ruled wisely for these seven years."

My son-in-law, Paul, suddenly entered the courtyard. He is a good man, I must admit. He loves his wife and son dearly. True, he is a Sadducee and has adopted much of the Greek culture, but he doesn't deny the great role that the Maccabees played as freedom fighters against the invaders. Unlike the Pharisees who are bearded and wear the traditional long robe, his face is clean-shaven and he wears a Greek short tunic, exposing his muscular, bare legs. Immodest, immodest, I thought.

His face was stern as he approached us. "Ephraim ben Kasriel," he addressed me, "I have sad news to relate." He hesitated as he studied my face. "Our governor, Simon, has been assassinated."

I must have paled, because Paul shouted to Alexander to bring me a cup of water. Twenty-five years of struggle, I was thinking, 25 years! What will happen now? Will we be invaded again by the Syrian/Greek Empire, or will it be the Romans this time?

Paul cleared his throat. "Be of stout heart, father-in-law," he said sympathetically. "Come into the house with us. We should put aside our differences at a time like this. I know why you have refused to enter our home for the last few years. I assure you that the Greek columns on either side of our door will not fall on you as you pass through them, and Naomi's dinner will be strictly kosher."

I was too shaken by the news of Simon's death to argue, and I didn't object as Paul and Alexander helped me to my feet and escorted me into the house.

As we sipped our wine after I had made the blessing, Paul said, "Ephraim ben Kasriel, my father, I know that your heart is heavy, but do not despair. The Maccabees' struggle will never be forgotten by the Jewish people. The Maccabees fought for our right of self-determination and the right to worship as we please. Given that right, our people can appreciate what is beautiful and universal in other people's cultures, but we will never forsake our own."

Postscript: The Roman general, Pompey, marched into Judea in 63 BCE and turned Judea into a Roman colony. The independent Jewish state in Palestine was finished, not to rise again until 1948.

Fred Narvey lives in Winnipeg.

This Chanukiah, probably from Germany, dates from the mid 15th century. It features the prayer recited during the candlelighting.

Opinions

Public officials must be accoúntable

The other day, while driving my children to school, I was passing through an intersection and suddenly a car, having ignored a yield sign, almost plowed into the side of my car.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

This is not unusual in Israel. At the last second, I swerved away, averting what surely would have been a nasty accident. Moments later, when I asked the driver if street signs mean anything to him, he answered with a dismissive wave of his hand – this is even less unusual in Israel – disavowing any responsibility for the near collision.

"Don't look at me!" or something to that effect is an all-too-familiar refrain of Israelis when asked to own up to their actions. Too often their attitude, in a snide variation of Alfred E. Newman's "What, me worry?" boils down to, "What, me take responsibility?"

The shameless lack of accountability in Israeli life is staggering, pervading every sector of society. It manifests itself when dealing with store managers, tradespeople and civil servants. It manifests itself in the rampant price gouging that makes this country often seem like one big rip-off.

To that end, some of the country's major companies behave with cavalier disregard for their customers. Until recently, Bezek had the overseas phone services market all to itself and acted accordingly – with high prices, dubious service and no recourse for the consumer. After the government finally broke its monopoly, Bezek greatly reduced its long-distance rates. A year later, Bezek still reported huge profits.

Two weeks ago, the Supreme Court rejected a petition from cable TV companies aimed at preventing the Communications Ministry from ending their monopoly over multi-channel television broadcasting. Until now, consumers have had to suffer exorbitant prices, mediocre service and a decreasing number of channels.

Early this month, the Israel Democracy Institute presented findings of its investigation to the Knesset Economics Committee showing that the major supermarket chains imposed unjustifiably steep price increases on dozens of imported and locally made products before the shekel began to fall.

In the political sphere, citizens often feel their elected representatives don't represent them. On the national level, there are no electoral districts. Since Knesset Members don't represent a particular area, they are accountable to no one except their party bosses and maybe their conscience.

In the government, it is extremely rare for a cabinet minister to hold himself or herself accountable and resign.

It's no better on the local level where neighborhoods don't have representatives on city council. You cast your ballot for a party and a mayor and that's it.

Tel Aviv, until last month's municipal elections, was without a functioning mayor for half a year. Since last spring when he announced his intention to run for prime minister in the next general election, Roni Milo had been virtually absent from his elected job. Instead, he spent his time creating a new party and travelling the globe to raise funds.

In Jerusalem, Mayor Ehud Olmert spends almost as much time abroad as he does in the capital. A few weeks ago, Olmert failed to dismiss one of his deputy mayors for highly offensive, racist remarks against Russian immigrants. Several MKs, including some from Olmert's own Likud party, had called on him to suspend Haim Miller, a haredi leader who also triggered a previous controversy when he denounced the Israeli flag as "only a rag."

Last month, representatives of victims of the Maccabiah bridge disaster appealed to the 3,000 delegates at the General Assembly of North American Jewish Federations (GA) in Jerusalem for support in their fight for justice. In July 1997, four Australian athletes were killed and 64 others injured when a footbridge they were crossing collapsed during the opening ceremony of the Maccabi Games near Tel Aviv.

At the GA, Australian Jewish leaders and their supporters (including prominent Canadian human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler) held a press conference during which they stressed the importance of public accountability. As such, one of their demands is that the two top executives of the Israel-based Maccabi World Union (MWU), which organized the games and commissioned the hastily-built bridge, resign, at least until the conclusion of legal proceedings.

Sadly, the Maccabiah bridge affair is only one of a litany of preventable tragedies for which public officials have dodged responsibility. At times, the concept of accountability seems an exotic concept. Tellingly, the word does not exist in Hebrew.

Of course, accountability would be far less of an issue if only people would do their jobs right in the first place, thereby avoiding the disasters that can result from slipshod planning and management. Don't look at me, I only live here.

Who's killing 'the spirit of Oslo'?

Following the continuous and systematic Palestinian violations of its commitments, Israel's patience with this farce finally snapped. By artificially whipping up Palestinians into a frenzy over the demand for the release of terrorists, Arafat has violated every aspect of the Wye agreement and the spirit of the Oslo process.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The language of threat and hatred, and the officially sponsored demonstrations and riots, are incitements to violence, leading to direct attacks against Israelis. When the mobs attacked Israeli cars outside Ramallah, the Palestinian "police," which were created in order to prevent such attacks, were nowhere to be seen.

By attempting to use violence and international pressure to force Israel to free hundreds of terrorists, Arafat is demonstrating that regardless of Israeli concessions and withdrawals, the demands for more will continue.

At the Wye Plantation talks, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not agree to release prisoners "with blood on their hands." How could he, when the terrorists freed by his predecessors are involved in the continuing terror attacks and suicide bombings? This was made clear at Wye, and has not changed. Arafat's old pattern of pocketing Israeli concessions and then attempting to force more, has continued. The conclusion is that regardless of Oslo or Wye, whenever the Palestinians do not get what they want, at any stage, they will resort to violence.

Even while Arafat was in Washington, accepting pledges for billions of dollars from donor states, the incitement and threats of violence continued. From the State Department platform, the PLO leader again declared his intention to end the negotiations by unilaterally declaring a Palestinian state, with Jerusalem as the capital. If the Palestinians are determined to declare independence, why should Israel go through the charade of negotiations and Israeli redeployments?

Indeed, following the mob attacks on the cars, and the beatings, Netanyahu had no alternative other than to suspend the farce. It is now painfully obvious that despite all of the words before, during and after the Wye summit, nothing has changed. The efforts to turn the Palestinian obligations into legal documents and measurable milestones have, as predicted, failed to bring about a change in Arafat's behavior.

The incitement, language of hate, and threat of terrorism continue.

However, the Palestinians also know that they have enjoyed a major advantage in the propaganda war. Following the series of attacks on Israelis, and Netanyahu's response, the journalists and editorial writers again blamed Israel. The agency France Presse, which might as well be an agency of the PLO, declared that Israel had "reneged" in the agreement reached at Wye.

These reports were reprinted around the world.

In the absurd Alice in Wonderland world of reporting on the Middle East, the Palestinians are still seen as the underdogs, while Israel is always at fault. Arafat has immunity, no matter what he does, or rather, what he fails to do. This pattern continues, despite the Palestinian suicide bombing attacks in Gaza a few weeks ago, and the Jerusalem attack. In both cases, Palestinian terrorists sought to kill dozens of Israelis. (In Gaza, the attack was aimed at a school bus, and in Jerusalem, the bombers sought to kill shoppers in the Machane Yehuda marketplace).

When the Palestinian Authority, under Arafat's direct control, began the violent demonstrations on the release of terrorists, they knew that the images that they created and controlled would be transmitted around the world. (Indeed, in the attack on the Israeli car outside Ramallah, television cameras were stationed all around the area, waiting for such an incident). The story was not one of Palestinian attacks against Israelis, but rather the demands of mothers and children for the release of their husbands and fathers, who were in Israeli jails, and held as "political prisoners."

In many cases, the press showed the pictures of the women with the photos, but did not report that the prisoners were terrorists, held for killing or attempting to kill Israelis. In dozens of interviews, Palestinian spokespersons naturally blamed Israel for violating the Wye agreement on prisoner release, and accused Netanyahu of attempting to renege on the withdrawal agreement. At first, even the U.S. government spokesperson, following the lead of the press, joined the chorus in accusing Israel, and only corrected its position after a few days, and not in a clear voice.

Netanyahu is in a bind. If he maintains the freeze on the process, he will be blamed for "killing the spirit of Oslo." If he resumes the Israeli withdrawal without fundamental changes in the nature of the process, the farce will continue.

At some point, this pattern must be reversed, and Israel must hold its ground while stating its case clearly and unequivocally. The longer we wait, the more difficult this will become.

Canada and Israel: Something new has been added

Sixty-three years ago, in April 1935, I found myself in Jerusalem. It was my first visit to the Yishuv, then being governed as a British mandate. I had come in order to participate in the second Maccabi Games, and when they were over I travelled the country.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In Jerusalem, something special was taking place on Mount Scopus: the 10th anniversary celebration of Israel's first (and then only) university. A lot of famous people attended the anniversary observance, and celebrated the great promise that the fledgling Hebrew University held in store, not only for Jews but for anyone who wanted to get a very special education. Many famous people were there to underscore the importance of the occasion – among them Lord Balfour, the author of the famous declaration of 1917 that had promised the Jewish people their homeland and had helped to raise the profile and promise of the Zionist movement. Chaim Weizmann, later to become Israel's first president, was present, as were all the greats of Zionist history, from founding president of the university, Judah Magnes, and David Ben-Gurion, later Israel's first prime minister, to Martin Buber and a host of movers and shakers of Zionism.

Since then, the Hebrew University has amply fulfilled the great promise that accompanied its establishment and which its visionary founders had enunciated in 1925 and repeated in 1935.

Now, so much later, the university has come up with a brand new scheme that involves people anywhere on the globe, and especially here in Canada. Two Ontario universities, together with the government of the province, have joined the Hebrew University in creating new opportunities. For every dollar that is contributed to the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the Ontario government will make a matching contribution that is designed to enable students enrolled at the universities of Toronto, York, Western Ontario, Guelph, Waterloo, Ottawa, Queens and McMaster to study in Jerusalem on a special fellowship. Additional matching funds were contributed by the two Toronto universities – so that every dollar given to the Friends of Hebrew University is now worth its triple amount.

A young cousin of mine is now in his third year at Hebrew University and writes the most enthusiastic letters about his experience. Other students have written letters such as these: "Studying here is an opportunity of a lifetime that should not be missed. This year changed me and put real passion and fire in my life for what it is to be Jewish."

This kind of experience potentially affects all of Canadian society: Undergraduate students return home with strengthened Jewish identity, and with a new commitment and understanding of Israel. Graduate students come enriched by their exposure to international, academic and research networks.

If you believe that the upshot of this article is an invitation to contribute to the matching funds scholarship program, you are right. Everything will be welcome, from little to much. There is only one problem: the opportunity ends on March 31, 1999.

Netanyahu scrambles to save his government

Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's embattled prime minister, was scrambling to save his political skin this week following a stunning bipartisan manoeuvre in the Knesset that almost resulted in new elections.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Thanks to a procedural sleight of hand and the backing of a haredi party, he won a reprieve. Now he has until Dec. 21 to plug the holes in his sinking coalition and thus prolong the life of his government.

No one will be too surprised if he succeeds. Since assuming office against all odds in the summer of 1996, he has confounded observers who've regularly predicted his demise.

Despite his survival skills, Netanyahu will be fortunate to wriggle out of this latest crisis, whose roots are entangled in the Oslo peace process, which he has regularly lambasted.

Netanyahu infuriated members of his shaky coalition, which commands but a one-seat majority in the Knesset, by signing the Wye memorandum on Oct. 23. The agreement broadly calls for an additional 13 percent Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank in exchange for a verifiable Palestinian crackdown on terrorism.

Netanyahu had trouble even convincing his own cabinet to ratify Wye. The accord won the support of just six of 17 ministers, including Ariel Sharon, the newly appointed foreign minister, who had previously blasted Oslo. Five voted against, three abstained and two were not present.

In the Knesset, Wye was passed by a comfortable 75-19 margin, with 19 abstentions, only because the Labor party, among others in the peace camp, backed it to the hilt.

Israel carried out the first of three withdrawals last month, ceding two percent of the West Bank and permitting the Palestinian Authority to open an airport in the Gaza Strip (about two-thirds of which is now controlled by the Palestinians).

But in implementing Wye's first phase, Netanyahu touched off a firestorm of protest in his constituency, whose attachment to the West Bank is based on religious, messianic and security grounds.

After Wye, the Land of Israel Front, a far-right Knesset group fiercely opposed to territorial concessions, went into battle mode, threatening yet again to topple Netanyahu.

The National Religious Party, meanwhile, was thrown into turmoil. A wing led by Education Minister Yitzhak Levy and Rabbi Haim Druckman, a disciple of former chief rabbis Avraham Shapira and Mordechai Eliahu, recommended early general elections. The central committee quashed the motion, 430-312, but failed to crush the dissidents.

And there was disaffection within the rank and file of the Lubavitch movement, which helped catapult Netanyahu to victory 2½ years ago. In a statement which spoke volumes, Rabbi Mordechai Ashkenazi, a Lubavitch activist, described Netanyahu as a "crook and a swindler" for having reneged on a promise to freeze withdrawals.

Rabbi Ashkenazi's ad-hominem attack on Netanyahu's personal integrity was in keeping with the rough and tumble norms of Israeli politics. So was Uzi Landau's blistering volley questioning Netanyahu's character. The hard-line Likudnik, who heads the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, said, "The prime minister cheats all of the time."

These bitter denunciations, as well as the rising level of discontent within his coalition, prompted Netanyahu to try to shore up his government. In a desperate move, he turned to David Levy, who, in a characteristically petulant huff, resigned as foreign minister last January. Netanyahu, thirsting after Levy's five Gesher Knesset seats, invited him back to the cabinet. Levy bit at the bait, but the putative deal – an exercise in naked cynicism – collapsed amid a flurry of accusations and counter accusations when Netanyahu denied him the finance portfolio.

As his negotiations with Levy teetered, Netanyahu dropped a bombshell. In the wake of the random beating of an Israeli soldier by a band of Palestinian rock throwers near Nablus, part of a pattern of renewed Palestinian rioting throughout the territories, he suspended the Wye agreement, blaming the Palestinian Authority for encouraging street protests.

No further withdrawals would take place, he declared, unless the Palestinian Authority pledged not to declare statehood next May, stopped demanding the release of Palestinian prisoners with "blood on their hands," and halted its campaign of incitement. The Palestinians rejected the demands as "completely unacceptable." The United States, which brokered Wye, advised Israel to implement the pact as signed.

The suspension of the second redeployment, which had been scheduled for Dec. 18, is a mixed blessing for Netanyahu.

Ehud Barak, leader of the Labor party, abruptly yanked the "safety net" from under Netanyahu's feet. Asserting he would no longer prop up his government in the face of far-right pressure to scuttle it, Barak sponsored a bill for early elections.

However, Rafael Eitan, leader of the hawkish Tsomet party, reversed course and announced that he would vote against the legislation. Much to Netanyahu's relief, the National Religious Party reiterated its opposition to early elections. Even flaming radicals like Druckman, Hanan Porat, Zvi Hendel and Nissim Slomiansky, all of whom are deeply disenchanted with Netanyahu, held their fire.

By way of gratitude, Netanyahu promoted Yitzhak Levy, a staunch adversary of territorial compromise, to the inner cabinet, composed of Ariel Sharon, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Last week, in an overture that suggests that his priority is sheer political survival rather than the perpetuation of the peace process, Netanyahu offered Moledet – a far-right party which has demonized Oslo – a seat in the cabinet. Moledet's Rechavam Ze'evi rebuffed Netanyahu, wary of his sincerity.

Netanyahu, too, requested a helping hand from the Arab Democratic party, whose leader, Abdel Wahab Darawshe, is a keen advocate of Oslo. Netanyahu told him that the suspension of the Wye redeployments was merely a temporary measure. But he reacted coldly to Netanyahu's cry of distress.

Netanyahu has offended the right and the left, given his propensity for making conflicting promises as the need arises. His natural allies on the right, notably Benny Begin and Dan Meridor, have already bolted, and more Likud loyalists may yet desert him. His days as prime minister may finally be numbered.

If all else fails, Netanyahu could have a trump card up his sleeve – the formation of a national unity government. Eleven members of his cabinet, from Sharon to Sharansky, as well as prominent Likudniks like Meir Shitreet and Reuven Rivlin, like the idea. However, Mordechai, a relative moderate, is chary, fearing that he could lose his position in such a realignment.

As usual, Netanyahu – who has discussed the subject with Barak – has been cagey, having come out for and against it, depending on the circumstances.

Barak is hardly enthusiastic. Last month, he virtually ruled out the possibility. As he put it: "We will not be a part of this terrible government." In the past, Barak gravitated toward this scenario, as long as Netanyahu was prepared to change his policies. But now, Barak strongly believes that Netanyahu is finished and that new elections are inevitable within six months.

He may be correct.

Israelis may be going to polls sooner rather than later.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Understanding Chanukah

When do you need a Catholic Bible to understand more about a Jewish holiday? When it's Chanukah. Here's why.

Two thousand one hundred years ago, the Bible was translated into Greek by 72 sages in 72 days, in Alexandria. Called the Septuagint, the "70," legend says that all the translators worked separately, but arrived at precisely the same translation. Certain books in Hebrew were valued more highly in Alexandria than in Israel. Among these scrolls, now called outside books in Hebrew, and the Apocrypha in English, were the Books of the Maccabees.

When our Tanach was "canonized" about 1,900 years ago by rabbis of the mishnaic period, they did not include the Books of the Maccabees. But the Septuagint became the standard translation for Greek-speaking Jews, as well as for the Greek Orthodox Church, and it is also the basis of the Catholic scriptures. If you want to read Maccabees, you need a copy of the Apocrypha, or you can open a Catholic Bible.

When we turn to the First and Second Book of Maccabees, we find an exciting, grisly compendium of history and woe, legend and triumph. The basis for the midrash of Hannah and her seven sons may be found in Maccabees II, chapter 7, but the midrash doesn't quite match the Apocrypha's explicitness about the horrors that befell the children of the unfortunate mother. The bravery of her family, and her own indomitable devotion to Judaism transferred to rabbinic lore.

Maccabees makes clear the fact that the Chanukah revolt of Mattathias and his sons against the Hellenistic Syrians led by Antiochus Epiphanes, was a two-pronged attack. Antiochus, whose last name means "good manifest on earth", desired to unify his lands with Greek paganism, and toward that end, he erected statues and altars where he demanded obeisance or death.

On the 25th day of every month, Antiochus' troops conducted pogroms against unyielding Jews. Rejecting paganism, Mattathias took his sword, and ran through a Jew who bowed to the idol in Modi'in, then called his people to arms against the Hellenists.

But the Apocrypha shows a second aspect of the revolt. Onias, a Jew, paid money to Antiochus and became a Friend of the King, a title like count or baron, and in exchange for favors rendered, Antiochus gave Onias the high priesthood. In Jewish tradition, the high priesthood cannot be bought, so the people were infuriated.

A certain Menelaus then paid more, and became a Friend of the King. Antiochus took the high priesthood from Onias, and gave it to Menelaus. Then Menelaus sacrificed swine's flesh upon the altar of the Temple in Jerusalem. This filled the people with enough rage against the Jewish Hellenizers to ignite, not only a war against foreign invaders, but a civil war against Jews who had gone over to the other side. So the Chanukah revolt was both a defensive action and a civil uprising.

When the dust cleared, with the Syrian Greeks pushed back and the Jewish Hellenizers defeated, the Temple was re-dedicated on the 25th of Kislev. The 25th, the monthly day of Jewish martyrdom, became the day of re-dedication.

Maccabees I traces the eight-day celebration to an imitation of Solomon's dedication; Maccabees II claims the Maccabees missed Sukkot, and made it up in Kislev. The Talmud tells the story of the oil, which speaks so profoundly of God's providence and inspiration.

With Jewish Hellenizers defeated, was Judaism unified? Many historians believe that during the Maccabeean revolt, two major religio-political groups, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, emerged.

While Chanukah allowed us to practise our ancestral faith without threat of pagan intervention, it also legitimated alternative responses within Judaism itself, thus creating more light for Jews everywhere.

These days of Chanukah, ma'alim bakodesh, let us go up in holiness as the lights mount in brightness.

The Jewish Highway

Chronology of Israeli money

You don't have to be a coin collector – or even an Israeli– to appreciate Israeli money. Israel's modern currency actually pre-dates the foundation of the state, and tells the story of the evolution of the country by depicting its heroes and its symbols, old and new. And since the country and its money are always changing, you can keep up on the latest developments on the Jewish Highway.

The Bank of Israel [http://www.bankisrael.gov.il] has put together an extremely impressive site, particularly in the area devoted to Israel Notes and Coins [http://www.bankisrael.gov.il/catal/catal.htm]. You get a concise, illustrated history of the evolution of money this century, from the Palestine pound and prutot, to Israeli pounds and agarot, to the hyper-inflation which ushered in shekalim and finally new shekalim.

Along the way, there are some fascinating anecdotes [http://www.bankisrael.gov.il/catal/ angl.htm]. On the eve of the establishment of the country, banknotes could not be printed locally since the British mandate had not yet expired and because of the lack of local expertise. At the same time, foreign firms did not want to print money for a non-existent state. Eventually, the American Banknote Company of New York was persuaded to help. But in order to get approval from the U.S. State Department to print foreign banknotes, the notes could give no indication that they were legal tender. That phrase had to be printed on later.

Palestine Pound used on notes

In addition, when the notes were printed, the name of the new country hadn't yet been decided, so the phrase Palestine Pound was used on the notes (as it had been during the mandate.) The banknotes reached the country secretly in July 1948, and went into circulation the following month. It wasn't until the country was four years old that it had its own Israel pounds.

Did you return from your last trip to Israel with a wallet full of bills you didn't have time to exchange? They're probably OK, but you may want to read up on counterfeit Israeli bills in circulation [http://www.bankisrael. gov.il/press/msgs/879411012/971111.htm]. This Hebrew-only Web site has several tips on how not to get stuck with a forgery. One example: on the current 100 new sheqel note, look inside a faint rectangle and you will see a menorah. On the counterfeit note, only the rectangle is visible.

And what of the future? The Bank of Israel has announced that at the beginning of 1999 the Bank will begin the gradual process of replacing the existing series of banknotes with a new one [http://www.bankisrael.gov.il/press/msgs/909577434/SHTAR3.HTM]. It points out that new technological advances in the area of security would protect the notes from counterfeiters who are also improving their methods.

And for the first time, the country will have a 500 new shekel bill. The personality to be honored: Yitzhak Rabin.

Jewish Life

Kaddish*, by Leon Wieseltier (Random House, $38.50).
Saying Kaddish*, by Anita Diamant (Random House, $32)

An astonishing work

Books
Bernard Baskin

Next to Shema, the Mourner's Kaddish is the most familiar and widely recited prayer in Judaism. Kaddish means holy, and this prayer is a brief declaration in praise of God, who is termed "Blessed, praised and honored, extolled and glorified, adored and exalted." This doxology, strangely, contains no reference to death.

Jews who seldom or ever pray are moved to recite the Kaddish for their loved ones. For many mourners, it becomes a mantra, a source of meditation, its few rhythmic sounds and syllables build a kind of incantation.

Written largely in Aramaic, parts of the Kaddish date from the first century BCE. It was added to in later centuries and by the Middle Ages it became part of the liturgy, and adopted by Jews everywhere.

Leon Wieseltier is literary editor of the New Republic magazine. During the year following the death of his father in 1996, he attended a small Orthodox shul near Washington D.C., or elsewhere when travelling, and recited the Kaddish three times a day. Reared in a traditional home, the son of Holocaust survivors, he had for many years, however, forsaken ritual and observance.

Kaddish is a rambling record of the author's impressions, reflections, questions, doubts and scholarly investigations during his year of mourning. The book's 16 chapters delve into arcane and often convoluted discussions on all matters relating to the history and many-sided meaning of the Kaddish. The author describes his immersion into a world of medieval texts, and what they taught him about the father-son relationship, the need for community, life after death, the role of women in prayer, the dilemmas of Jewish learning and survival, and a host of related matters.

Often dense and difficult entries alternate with lighter comments about the small group with whom he prays, enigmatic aphorisms about religion and the vagaries of Jewish community life. He writes "The shul is losing its strangeness for me. This worries me. In a strange place, solitariness is possible. Sociability poses a threat to spirituality. Now, I'm coming to know my fellow petitioners. They are no longer strangers, they are becoming friends. How do you pray with friends? How do you pray with anybody?... And yet the congregation is one of the conditions of my kaddish."

Kaddish is a book like no other – fervent, illuminating, pedantic, lyrical, searching — an astonishing fusion of learning and psychic intensity. It must be studied as well as read. In the end, the tenacious and sensitive reader relates to the author when he writes that this was "the year in which I discovered the fine fit of rags, the silk, in the sack cloth."

* * *

Anita Diamant is a popular columnist who has written a series of books about Jewish ritual and observance. Saying Kaddish is a useful and informative non-denominational manual on the nature of the Jewish funeral, shivah and yahrzeit, tzedakah and Yizkor – how to make an ethical will, or mourn the loss of a stillborn or miscarried child.

This lucid and helpful guide shows how to transform times of grief into personal sources of comfort. It is warmly recommended.

Deep insights into Torah

If you have ever been awake at midnight on Saturday in a small Moroccan synagogue in Israel, you may have experienced the beauty and splendor of the singing of the Shirat Habakashot (poems of the requests), a collection of piyyutim (liturgical songs) from the book called Shir Yedidout.

On the Shabbat following Simchat Torah, Jews of Moroccan descent begin their tradition of singing from Shir Yedidout (songs of love between the Jewish nation and God) in the synagogue. This collection of piyyutim was published in Marrakech in 1921, and is believed to be the revised edition of an earlier collection of piyyutim titled Rini Vesimchi (1890).

Moroccan Jews and other Sephardi communities have the custom of waking up during the night on the Shabbatot between Sukkot and Pesach, and gathering in the synagogue to sing the piyyutim of Shirat Habakashot.

The collection of piyyutim includes works of composers from early Spain, such as Rabbi Yehudah Halevy and Rabbi Shlomo iben Gavirol, as well as piyyutim composed by later paytanim (poets) who lived in Morocco approximately 150 years ago. It is important to note that all of these composers were also talmidim chachamim (learned men), considered to be some of the best Torah scholars of their time.

Although it may seem somewhat unusual to us that such great rabbis were also so devoted to poetry, it was inevitable that these two occupations would go hand in hand, because the poetry written in Shir Yedidout contained deep insights into the Torah.

Rabbi Chaim Shoshana is an example of a talmid chacham (Torah scholar) who contributed to Shir Yedidout. Born in Marrakech at the end of 1912, he was a rabbi in the city of Dimnat, and in 1956, he was elected to serve as a dayan (judge) in the chief rabbinical court of Casablanca.

There were many grammatical errors in both Rini Vesimchi and Shir Yedidout, and Rabbi Shoshana took it upon himself to correct the mistakes. After completing this difficult task, which took almost five years, Rabbi Shoshana produced the new edition of Shir Yedidout and called it Aeira Sachar, which in Hebrew means "awaken the dawn" – exactly what Shirat Habakashot is all about. In the three volumes of Aeira Sachar, Rabbi Shoshana not only corrected the grammatical faults and punctuated the piyyutim, he also added commentaries about the songs.

Shir Yedidout has approximately 550 piyyutim, organized into chapters according to the weekly Torah portions. Preceding each chapter of the piyyutim is the Tikun Chatzot, a prayer that is recited in memory of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem.

Shirat Habakashot originated in Safed and was brought to Morocco via many different messengers. At the outset, these messengers transmitted the poetry to the congregation to which they belonged, with the result that each community had its own individual piyyutim, which their members recited.

The collections of piyyutim from the different congregations and communities grew, as a result of the spiritual growth in the community of Morocco. The works of Rini Vesimchi (and later of Shir Yedidout) were probably developed in order to create a unified nusach (style) of Shirat Habakashot, a nusach that would be accepted by all the Jewish communities of Morocco.

Although the topics dealt with in the piyyutim vary greatly, probably the most common is the exile and the final redemption of the Jewish nation. It is important to remember that during various periods in the history of the Jewish nation, the Jews were prohibited by their governing nations to study the Torah.

It is for this reason that excerpts from the Zohar, Kabbalah, Torah, Talmud and Halachah were incorporated into the piyyutim. The Jews, who could not openly study the Torah and Jewish tradition, still continued to learn them secretly through the piyyutim.

HAPPY CHANUKAH! NEED WE SAY MORE?

A year to remember

By JEHUDI KINAR

When this article appears, it will be a year since we started our 50th anniversary celebrations. What a year this was!

Why did I dedicate so much space in my columns to these celebrations, when so many other events have also happened this year? It is because the independence of Israel after nearly two millennia cannot be celebrated enough. Clearly, others feel the same way, to judge by the number of people in the community who put such time and effort into making each of the Israel at 50 events so memorable.

Diplomatically Speaking
Jehudi Kinar

In our desire to be together in marking the 50th anniversary of Israeli statehood, there was no difference between left and right, between Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Jews, or between young and old. Differences were laid aside during this happy period, and in fact, from what I've heard, these events have contributed to a greater sense of unity in the Jewish community.

Over the past year, we have had three film festivals in Toronto alone where Israeli films were feted, and the Israeli community in Toronto hosted a film event. Festivals of Israeli films were also held in Edmonton and Vancouver. All this points to an impressive maturing of Israeli filmmakers and the film industry. Other aspects of Jewish and Israeli culture were also abundant at these events, which included art exhibits, and many fine singers and musicians.

The consulate worked hard to help with the events wherever possible, but their success was a result, not only of the contributions of many hardworking volunteers from the community, but also of the hundreds of thousands of people who attended.

The events were an impressive demonstration of the close connection between Canadian Jews and Israel. The State of Israel has always been extremely important to Canadian Jewry and will continue to be so in the future. As a result of the fantastic response to this past year's events, members of the Canadian Jewish community, on their own initiative, have already approached the consulate to discuss cooperating on plans for celebrations of Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel's Independence Day) in 1999.

All in all, it was a year to remember, a year of which the Canadian Jewish community should be very proud.

The Train of Life

*L*ife is like a speeding passenger train;
With every second moving ever forward;
Carrying its passengers with it;
On to new bright sights, sounds and experiences.

*D*eath occurs when a passenger falls from the train;
Carrying not only the departed family member;
But all those who loved and cherished them.

*T*ime now stops for all parties;
Colors dull and become muted;
The scenery remains the same for all time;
As those still in the land of the living watch the train continue its journey.

*T*he choice now for the living is often painful;
Do they forever remain at that point along the tracks;
Never changing until their lives too come to an end;
Or do they say a final farewell;
Make the necessary adjustments;
And rejoin the Train of Life?

Prutschi returning to CJC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Manuel Prutschi, a longtime Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) professional who left the organization last year to serve as executive vice-president of the World Sephardic Educational Centre and the Sephardic Kehila Centre, is returning to CJC.

He will become the organization's national director of community relations, effective Jan 4, 1999.

The national community relations committee deals primarily with anti-Semitism and discrimination, human rights advocacy, interaction between the Jewish community and other groups, and relations with government and media.

A native of Ecuador, Prutschi says he was made to feel very much at home by the Sephardi community. While he's not renouncing his Ashkenazi roots, he considers himself "very much a part" of Toronto's Sephardi community and plans to remain involved on a volunteer basis, he said.

He is stepping down by mutual agreement, he told The CJN, because the part of his position involving the World Sephardic Educational Centre, which was to have a significant international component, did not pan out as anticipated. (The Toronto chapter of the WSEC is still active, however.)

"It essentially became a localized, administrative position," said Prutschi. "Certainly it's an important job, but it's not one I'm most inclined to do, nor is my expertise focused in those areas."

In his career with CJC, where he worked for over 16 years, he headed the community relations department nationally, and prior to that regionally in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Ontario. Most recently he was executive director for the Ontario region.

"I really did miss the intellectual challenge and the contact with the various communities that make up Canada," Prutschi said of the past year.

"Overseeing the community relations agenda was always a passion of mine," he stated in a CJC news release.

Prutschi has extensive experience in intergroup relations, multiculturalism, human rights advocacy and international affairs. He has played a major role in Canadian court cases and human right tribunals dealing with anti-Semitism and racist extremists.

A Tribute to Decades of Leadership

UJA Federation recently celebrated past and present successes at a tribute to Past Women's Campaign Chairs. Carol Kassel, one of 20 former Women's Campaign leaders in attendance, emphasized the "strong connection and commitment" UJA Federation engenders within its volunteers, recounting to the honourees and their families more than 50 years of campaign highlights.

Sarena Koschitzky, who co-chaired the luncheon gathering along with Kassel, Julie Albert and Nyla Ahmad, applauded the tributees, representing five decades of pioneering leadership, for helping the UJA Federation campaign grow from $50,000 to over $41million this year.

Judy Engel, the current Women's Campaign Chair, recognized several leading donors whose significant gift increases have helped the Campaign for Fifty raise an additional $5.5 million this year.

"You have strengthened the foundation of this campaign for the past 50 years, allowing a new generation of leaders to carry us forward," said Engel.

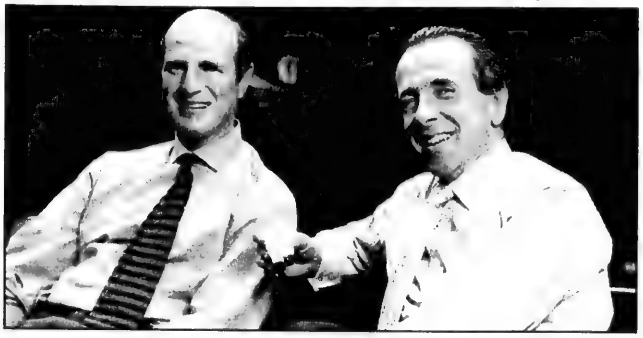
Community Matters

Record-Breaking UJA Campaign

A year to remember...

With a projected, record-breaking $41.5 million total for 1999, UJA Federation took fundraising to new heights this year.

In September, an unprecedented display of community support for Super Sunday, UJA Federation's single largest fundraising event, secured another record-breaking $2.1 million to the campaign, with an additional $400,000 from Super Week telethons.



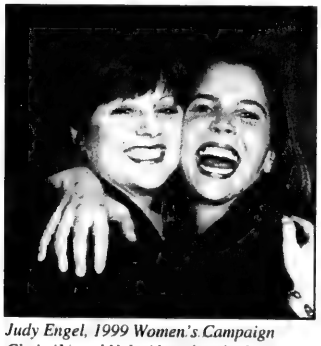
Campaign for Fifty Co-Chairs Brent Belzberg (l) and Larry Tanenbaum.

Hundreds celebrated this bright beginning of a three-year drive to raise $50 million by 2001 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on Monday night. The event, chaired by Leslie Gales and Bram Granovsky, featured volunteer recognition presentations and performances by Israeli musician Yehuda Elyas.

The additional funds raised will be used to support programs to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews from danger around the world.

A Great Start!

On August 31, with a $3 million lead over last year's start, the campaign enjoyed early success, fueled by large gift increases among UJA Federation's top donors.



Judy Engel, 1999 Women's Campaign Chair (L) and Nyla Ahmad at the Past Women's Campaign Chairs Tribute.

By the fifth week, close to 1,500 volunteers propelled the campaign passed the $22 million mark, with donor increases averaging 20%. In mid-November, just as a specially appointed team of top campaigners embarked on the final push to contact contributors, the $41 million mark was well in sight.

"The true success of the campaign is the level of community involvement," noted Brent Belzberg, who co-chaired the Campaign for Fifty with Larry Tanenbaum. "It's the buy-in from so many new young members of the community and their willingness to ensure that we continue to build on this year's growth."

The Yovel Singers performing at the Campaign for Fifty launch rallied hundreds of community members in support of UJA Federation.

"We live in an extraordinary community with an unsurpassed sense of collective responsibility to care for those who can't care for themselves," said Tanenbaum. "That's why I am so proud to be involved."

Past UJA Federation Campaign Chairs David Goldstein (l) and Al Green were among dozens of former Chairs honoured this year.

People Power

"UJA Federation's commitment to educating the community, strong leadership from Brent and Larry, and a reaffirmed commitment to Israel through year-long 50th anniversary celebrations, were key factors in the campaign's success," said Glennie Lindenberg, who served as Campaign Vice-Chair with Howard Price and Abe Glowinsky.

"Our volunteers and supporters should be proud of the inroads we have made in responding to the needs of UJA Federation beneficiary agencies which require our help," added Glowinsky.

"The community really rose to the challenge of securing our collective future".

"I feel privleged to have worked with the incredebly dedicated volunteers whose resolution to get the job done never let up," added Price.

Future Looks Bright

"We are confident that we will see the same growth moving forward and that each and every member of the community will make UJA Federation their preeminent gift," concluded Belzberg.

Over 600 volunteer campaigners joined Super Sunday Chairs Maura Cooperberg (l) and Leo Goldhar in raising $2.1 million in just one day!

German community takes hard look at its history

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two years ago, the north German town of Lubeck made headlines around the world – and not for anything for which the townspeople could take pride.

The world took notice when local neo-Nazis set fire to a residence occupied by immigrant workers, killing 10 people. The tragedy came to symbolize the resurgence of xenophobic race hatred that Germany had been trying to eliminate since the end of World War II.

Last month the people of Lubeck worked hard to show another side of their community as they hosted an academic conference titled, Time to Remember, 60 years after Kristallnacht.

Fifty scholars from around the world attended the conference, including historian Frank Bialystok, the only Canadian to participate.

The commemorations themselves were intensely moving, particularly because one took place in the beautifully restored turn-of-the-century synagogue in the town centre, he said. But more impressive was the attitude of the people and the large turnout of young Germans who were struggling to come to terms with Germany's past and with current manifestations of hatred.

"I think they were coming out for themselves and saying, 'This isn't the way we feel about things,'" Bialystok, who co-authored a Canadian curriculum on teaching about the Holocaust, said.

Most segments of the local German population were represented at the conference, including the local bishop, the president of the state government of Schleswig-Holstein and the local burgermeister (mayor), Bialystok said. The media covered the event extensively and the workshops and plenary sessions "were jammed" with local people who took an interest in the proceedings.

The synagogue was the venue for the opening of the conference, which coincided with the anniversary of Kristallnacht, the night 60 years ago when Jews were attacked, shops destroyed and synagogues burned by rampaging Germans.

The synagogue survived Kristallnacht unscathed because the Nazis feared a fire set there would spread to a museum next door. Instead, Nazis broke into the house of worship and desecrated it, tearing down the holy Ark to get at the Torah scrolls, Bialystok said.

The shul was used as a storage facility during World War II. In 1994, it was the subject of an attempted arson that led to the arrest of four young neo-Nazis. A 1995 arson attack is still unsolved. A local pastor who spoke out against the attacks received death threats from extremists, Bialystok added.

The Kristallnacht commemoration in the shul was respectful and moving, he said. "I was quite taken by the fact the synagogue was full with several hundred people, including some young German kids."

Lubeck's restored synagogue

From there, the commemoration moved to the town's medieval cathedral, which was jammed with about 1,000 people. The town's bishop, mayor and the president of Schleswig-Holstein addressed the crowd in an attempt to come to terms with the legacy of the Third Reich, he said.

Much of the conference focused on education issues, such as teaching German history. One panel focused specifically on education about "the sites of destruction," like the Majdanek and Buchenwald concentration camps, he said.

Bialystok, who's travelled to Germany five times in the last few years, said "there really is an attempt in certain circles to deal with this history. There are so many reactions to it, from neo-Nazis to those who don't want to talk about it anymore to those who say, 'It's our history and we have to confront it.'"

One particularly gratifying aspect of the conference occurred after a workshop that was attended by many young people, Bialystok said. They brought a personal perspective to the issue.

"One youngster said he had one grandfather who served in the SS, the other in the Wehrmacht (army) and even today, one is more anti-Semitic than the other, so 'I don't have any respect for them'" Bialystok related. Surprisingly, it was the army veteran who was more anti-Semitic than the SS man.

Another young person told how his grandfather explained there was so much pressure to conform in the Nazi era, the people had no choice. "Then he would put down the Russians and the Turks, who, he said, were taking over the country. That youth said, 'How can I talk to him about anything?'" Bialystok related.

"They had no qualms talking about these heavy issues," he added.

Architects discuss structures that commemorate Shoah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Are there esthetic solutions to mass murder?

Judging by the museums and memorials which have sprung up to commemorate the Holocaust, the answer seems clear.

Last week, three internationally renowned architects ruminated about their work in light of this question. Their topic was Remembering the Holocaust in North America, Germany and Israel.

At a forum sponsored by the Goethe-Institut and the Design Exchange, Moshe Safdie discussed the wholesale reorganization of Yad Vashem; Daniel Libeskind talked about the Jewish Museum in Berlin, and other projects in Germany; and James Ingo Freed spoke of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

All three illustrated their presentations with slides.

Safdie, an Israeli who designed Yad Vashem's children's memorial, said the $45 million renovation and expansion of Yad Vashem will be finished within several years.

He estimated that two to three million visitors would soon visit Yad Vashem annually, up from several hundred thousand not too long ago.

Safdie, who achieved fame with the avant garde Habitat housing project at Expo 67, disclosed that a new historical museum and a Hall of Names, commemorating the victims of the Holocaust, will be built.

Plans also call for the construction of a wall to separate the "sacred" part of the complex from the parking lots and arrival area.

The projected structures, he explained, will blend in with Jerusalem's mountainous terrain.

Describing his relationship with the Holocaust, Safdie said his first wife was a survivor, and his second wife's mother passed through the Auschwitz concentration camp.

As an architect, his involvement with Yad Vashem began in 1976, when he designed the now much-acclaimed children's memorial.

Libeskind, the son of Polish survivors, said that Berlin's Jewish museum is expected to open in January 2000.

It will celebrate the history of Berlin Jewry. The design, he said, incorporates a stylized Star of David, and "dead" spaces for introspection and voids to recall the darker side of Germany's past, including pogroms.

Libeskind suggested that the museum will leave the impression that there was always an "impenetrable wall" between Jews and Germans, the integration of Jews into German society notwithstanding.

Speaking of the art museum in Osnabruck, Lower Saxony he created in honor of the late painter Felix Nussbaum, Libeskind said its design suggests abrupt transitions, and therefore mirrors Nussbaum's own life. He was placed aboard the last transport from Brussels to Auschwitz.

Since the opening of the museum recently, 40 of Nussbaum's paintings thought to have been lost have turned up, he reported.

As well, Libeskind described a commission he received for a massive housing project in Oranienberg, a town next to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp.

Freed, born in Germany, called the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum a building which speaks to visitors.

In designing this landmark, he said he was thinking of memory rather than history.

Every space, every nook and cranny, has a meaning, but nothing is what it seems, he observed.

Is your soul worth $225 Million?
Over 700 missionary groups think so!

More than 700 different fundamentalist missionary groups across North America invest over $225 million annually in their attempt to convert Jews to Christianity.

These aggressive missionary organizations specifically target the most vulnerable members of our community. These include the elderly, Russian immigrants, isolated university students and unafilliated Jews.

Too many of our people have been lost to their efforts. You know who these groups are. Some of them even masquerade as Jews, calling themselves "Hebrew Christians" or "Messianic Jews".

Their practices are condemned by Jewish and Christian leaders alike.

Jews for Judaism is the only international Jewish organization that is exclusively dedicated to responding to this evangelical threat. Community leaders and rabbis endorse Jews for Judaism's educational and outreach programs which inspire Jewish pride and commitment.

This Chanukah, as we rededicate ourselves to the ethical and spiritual values of Judaism, Jews for Judaism is taking a stand. But we can't do it alone.

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

Our invaluable services, which include counselling, lectures, classes, outreach and literature production require your generous support.

Teens chosen for prestigious international MIT forum

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gil Hagi and Tsipora Mankovsky, both 16-year-old Grade 11 students in the gifted program at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, were among a select group of 100 teens chosen to take part in a recent international forum hosted by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) Media Lab in Cambridge, Mass.

Prior to the Junior Summit, as the six-day meeting was called, some 3,000 teens from 139 countries used their computers for online discussions of issues like child poverty, education, child labor, and how technology can be used to improve the world. Major sponsors of the project included Citibank, the LEGO Group and Swatch, and students presented their ideas to business leaders and politicians.

Participants created a cybercountry, Nation1, to unite children around the world on line. Leaders plan to apply for United Nations representation.

Hagi, a native of Israel who moved here just before his ninth birthday, has "a little more hope for the future" and "a little more faith" in his generation following the summit.

The summit participants represented over 50 countries, including Israel.

It began with an invitation to youngsters to describe their current world, and to suggest ways technology might be used to improve that world.

Mankovsky approached Hagi to suggest trying out for the program as a team. She's worked as a graphic designer since the age of 14; he admits to "dabbling" in computers, and hopes to study computer science at MIT. Mankovsky says Hagi is an "amazing" programmer and 3-D animator.

Their entry, which they uploaded to MIT by computer, featured a "walk-through science lab."

Mankovsky, an alumna of Bialik Hebrew Day School, saw the summit as "a great opportunity to reach out to kids across the world and make some change."

Hagi feels the experience has broadened his empathy for world situations – like the hurricane that passed through Jamaica, where one of the members of their online group was.

"It kind of makes the world smaller," said Hagi. "You're made more aware of other cultures."

To facilitate exchange of ideas, the students – whom Mankovsky describes as brilliant, with a passion for changing things – were divided into topic groups. Translation technology was used to bridge language barriers.

Technology is a big part of the answer to problems in the education system, believes Mankovsky.

"It's the ultimate communication tool," said Hagi.

"But we have to remember it is a tool, and that minds are behind it," said Mankovsky. "We lead the computers, the computers don't lead us."

The students "all want the same things," said Mankovsky. "We all want to be happy. We all want our lives to be rich and our families to be safe."

Having taken an active leadership role organizing committees at the summit, Mankovsky learned a lot about leadership, trust and compassion, she said.

Locally, she has joined her school's environmental club – a small but significant step, she believes.

"I learned that changing the world doesn't mean making it perfect. It means helping one person at a time and setting an example."

BGU campaign launched for women's health centre

By CYNTHIA NYMAN ENGEL
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — With the recent opening of its Centre for Women's Health Studies and Promotion, Ben-Gurion University (BGU) is poised to make major contributions to Israeli women's health issues.

Speaking recently before a group of BGU supporters in Ottawa, Dr. Julie Cwikel, the centre's founding chair and co-director said, "BGU is the first Israeli university to address women's health issues."

Ottawa was chosen as the venue to spearhead a cross-country campaign to raise funds in support of the new centre.

"The focus used to be on reproductive care but there is far more involved in women's health," Cwikel said. "If we deal only with reproductive issues, we're dealing only with half a life.

"Women have unique health problems over the life cycle, before and after the reproductive years. Many of the problems women experience in their teens are carried throughout their lives.

"The women who live in the Negev offer a marvellously diverse group in which to conduct our research. Given this diversity, the challenge of delivering health services is much greater than it would be in Israel's major cities," she said.

The 150,000 women who populate the Negev comprise veteran Israelis, Bedouins, new immigrants, residents of kibbutzim, moshavim and development towns and, Cwikel noted, each group has its unique problems and issues.

"For example, among immigrants from the former Soviet Union, there is a high rate of breast cancer," she said. To counter the growing problem, the centre will train women to run breast cancer support.

"Unique health problems abound among the 40,000 to 50,000 Bedouin women aged 12-55 scattered throughout the Negev," she said. "With 7.7 children per woman of reproductive age, they have the highest birth rate in the world. This high birth rate runs the risk of exhausting the women's physical and psychological resources.

"In addition, Bedouin women also suffer a high rate of respiratory problems due to dust and fire smoke in their environment," Cwikel said. "Interestingly, the Bedouin men do not have these problems to the same extent because it is the women who do the cleaning and cooking."

The impetus for the centre came from people outside the university, who realized that while the university has a unique hospital setup, the Negev suffers from a scarcity of widely available services such as family planning, a women's counselling centre or a central place from which to disseminate information on women's health.

"There's a long list of proposed projects," Dr. Cwikel said. A priority among these is an in-depth look at heart disease, which is typically thought to be a man's disease, but which is the number one killer of women as well."

Cwikel earned two degrees in social work in Israel, and studied public health and gerontology at the University of Michigan. Her co-director, epidemiologist Dr. Ilana Shoham-Vardi, has run para-professional training courses in public health for Bedouin women.

For further information on the centre, call Claire Horwitz, BGU executive director, 665-8054.

Sports dinner held

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The first Community Sports Dinner, held recently at the Ottawa Athletic Club, raised more than $30,000, a portion of which will go towards the children's charity, the Snowsuit Fund.

The dinner, co-sponsored by the Soloway Jewish Community Centre and the Snowsuit Fund, attracted more than 350 sports fans and such sports celebrities as Ottawa Senators coach Jacques Martin, Ottawa 67s head coach and general manager Brian Kilrea, and Frank Mahovlich.

Former JCC president, Lawrence Greenspon, who conceived the idea for a sports dinner about seven years ago, agreed to co-chair the event with Dave Smith, he said, "on the condition that a portion of the proceeds go to the Snowsuit Fund."

Hamilton JNF launches Negev Dinner campaign

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton Jewish National Fund (JNF) kicked off its campaign with a reception in honor of the 1999 Negev Tribute Dinner honorees, and with the introduction of the new JNF shaliach.

The honorees are the Loewith family: Minna Loewith and her sons and their wives, Harry and Liz, Carl and Verna and David and Bonnie. Missing will be Minna's husband, Joe, who died just a few weeks after learning that his family had been named honorees.

This is the first time in Hamilton's JNF Negev Dinner history that the tribute will be in honor of an entire family.

The Loewiths are the award-winning dairy farmers of Lynden, Ont., who came to Canada 60 years ago as refugees from Czechoslovakia. Members of Temple Anshe Sholom throughout these years, all are supporters of Israel and the local Jewish community.

Carl is a past president of Temple Anshe Sholom and current president of Shalom Village; Verna has been active in Temple Anshe Sholom sisterhood; David is a former Jewish Community Centre president, now serving as second vice-president of Temple Anshe Sholom, and Bonnie was 1996-98 United Jewish Appeal (UJA) women's division co-chair.

The new JNF shaliach is Effie (Ephraim) Sussman. A lawyer and former pilot with the Israel Air Force, Sussman studied aeronautical law at McGill University in the early '70s. He was director of legal affairs for El Al, and also served in diplomatic posts with the Israeli ministry of foreign affairs. He is a member of the Israeli bar, and in 1986, was admitted to the New York State bar.

While Sussman, who is here with his wife, Tiki, will be based in Hamilton, he will also serve the smaller Ontario communities outside of Toronto and Ottawa.

Sussman stressed the importance of developing the desert in Israel, and the need for continued support for the JNF's Action Plan Negev.

The dinner will take place June 2, 1999, at Adas Israel Synagogue. Proceeds will go towards the establishment of a Loewith "twin" dairy farm on Kibbutz Neve Harif in the Arava, said Hilda Rosen JNF president. The project was chosen, she said, by David and Bonnie on their recent trip to Israel.

CJC region aiming to work closer with communities

KITCHENER — Keith Landy, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region (CJC) chair, made a recent commitment to make smaller Jewish communities a full working partner of the region.

Following its first officers' meeting outside the Greater Toronto Area, CJC Ontario region is calling on federations to strike a joint committee to address the urgent needs of students on campuses, particularly in communities without Jewish federations.

After hearing from student leaders at the open meeting at Congregation Beth Jacob in Kitchener, Landy promised that Congress would contact the federations about the lack of basic financial assistance and resources for the province's Jewish campus organizations and students, and propose a joint committee to address those needs.

"This is crisis situation," said Landy after listening to Heath Applebaum, chair of Kol Hastudentim, the representative body for Jewish students on 16 Ontario campuses, and leaders of a 20-person delegation from the Waterloo University-Sir Wilfrid Laurier University Jewish Student Association. Landy was especially concerned about the "disturbing" lack of funds and resources for the approximately 500 Jewish students at the Waterloo-area universities.

Most of the students come from Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. The organization operates without staff support.

Applebaum, who is also a CJC regional officer, told the meeting that this group last year received a $5,000 grant from UIA Federation of Canada, which CJC administered on their behalf. There has been no grant forthcoming for this fiscal year. The student-run body, in operation since 1996, functions as a unifying body by promoting, organizing and facilitating province-wide campus programs.

"We can't continue coordinating the entire province alone," said Applebaum. "Investment needs to be made in campus services. We are the future of the Jewish community."

"This is our last chance at Jewishness before we go off into the working world," said Beth Suraski, co-president of Waterloo-Laurier Jewish Student Association.

Michael Soberman, regional director of community services and youth activities, pointed out that "a much higher percentage of Jewish students on smaller campuses participate in Jewish groups, partly because they are away from home. We, who service these students, have to ensure that there is Jewish life on campus. They want it."

Landy said that he is committed to increasing CJC's contribution to servicing and responding to the needs of province's smaller Jewish communities. However, he pointed out that Congress is not a funding body.

The Kitchener meeting focused on CJC programs and services for small communities. Dr. Michael Sobol of Guelph, co-chair of the community services and youth activities committee, gave an overview of the 8,000 Ontario Jews not living in federated communities.

The region plans to hold some future meetings in other small communities including Sudbury, Peterborough and Guelph.

Amend citizenship bill: BBC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) is calling on the federal government to amend a citizenship bill, to allow for the removal of people who had been involved in persecution before they came to Canada.

Such a step would give prosecutors another arrow in their quivers as they attempt to denaturalize and deport alleged Nazi war criminals, said David Matas, BBC's honorary senior legal counsel.

"It would also more closely go to who we're trying to remove," he said.

Spokespersons for Canadian Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre endorsed Matas' proposal, saying anything that can be used to bring war criminals to justice is welcome.

Under current Canadian law, alleged Nazi war criminals can be stripped of their citizenship on the grounds that they lied on a material fact when they entered the country, and later when they obtained their citizenship.

The fraud or misrepresentation attributed to the suspects usually concerns their participation in Nazi units involved in genocide. But the presumption that they lied can be rebutted and serves as a gap in the legislation, Matas argues.

"I think it's useful to add a ground to deport someone who participated in persecution," he said. That would bring Canada's legislation closer to American law, which was updated in the late 1970s by the Holtzman amendment and which has allowed U.S. prosecutors to register more deportations of Nazi war criminals than Canada, he said.

"It is imperative that the government take advantage of the current initiative to change the Citizenship Act by introducing an amendment to close this gap in the legislation. Because Canada's Criminal Code has proven to be an ineffective remedy for dealing with war criminals, the government must ensure that the one remaining route, loss of citizenship and deportation, is as effective as possible... Particularly in this year of the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we must take serious action to bring to justice the worst violators of human rights," Matas said.

"Any initiative that makes it more difficult for war criminals to remain in this country is an initiative we would support," said Congress legal counsel Jack Silverstone. "Certainly we would urge the [Citizenship] Department to give this proposal serious consideration."

"We certainly support that kind of recommendation," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

"The U.S. experience shows this can be an effective weapon and can be a sévere punishment for those who would prefer not to leave their country of choice," he said.

Littman suggested such a provision could apply as well to modern-day war criminals. "We think people involved in torture, in making people disappear, like in Argentina and Chile, should not be given Canadian citizenship," he added.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, declined to say whether the committee that advanced the recent citizenship recommendations considered Matas' proposal. Canada's law remains based on a question of fraud or misrepresentation, he said.

"[Matas' approach] would be a different proposition, of course. The United States has had success based on the allegation of persecution. I don't know if I could say if it would be helpful or not. We have a valid program in effect now," Vickery said.

Matas said B'nai Brith will advance its proposal at the parliamentary committee stage.

Symposium examines Jews' Golden Age in Spain

By KITTY HOFFMAN
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — The Golden Age of Jews in medieval Spain came alive recently at the University of Victoria.

Co-sponsored by the Jewish Community Centre of Victoria and the university, the all-day symposium attracted almost 300 people to an event that included Sephardi poetry, food, music and lectures by world experts on art, language, literature and social history.

Vancouver's Rabbi Yosef Benarroch, a Canadian of Sephardi heritage and the rabbi of Beth Hamidrash, Canada's only Sephardi synagogue west of Toronto, chaired a panel of all four guest lecturers at the close of the day.

Speaking of his own congregants, from homelands as diverse as Iraq, Morocco, Italy, Greece, Syria, Iran, Turkey and Sarajevo, Rabbi Benarroch was delighted that the symposium had brought to life the roots of a culture that, in Canada, is "a minority inside a minority."

Since most Jews in North America, he noted, are of Ashkenazi or eastern European descent, little is known here of the culture of the Sephardi Jews, descended from those who were expelled from Spain in 1492.

While some may know of Maimonides' philosophy and perhaps know of Judah Halevi's poetry, few are aware of the flowering of culture that took place among the Jews of medieval Spain, or why that period is known as the Golden Age of Jewish writing.

Joan C. Ullman, professor emerita of history at the University of Washington, set the social and historical context, and noted that while "not everything was golden in the Golden Age," nevertheless the Islamic laws of the Moorish Empire allowed different cultures to flourish, and it was a time of relative tolerance, diversity and pluralism. The Islamic, Christian and Jewish cultures were able not only to coexist, but actually to mutually influence each other, she said.

Ullman also noted that "a central theme of the formative Middle Ages...was the impact of Jewish mentality on 'the innermost recesses of the Christian mentality.'"

For her, the most interesting aspect of the period was that Jews were able to "acculturate, not assimilate," and she noted that there are striking parallels with and lessons for the current situation of Jews in North America.

Dr. Vivian B. Mann, curator of Judaica at the Jewish Museum in New York, gave an illustrated tour of the art and architecture of Spanish Jews.

She said much of our current knowledge has to be based on extrapolation from documents and written descriptions, and from scholarly tracing of motifs and forms, as so much of the actual art and architecture has been destroyed. Of the 12 synagogues in Toledo, for example, only one remains. The only Jewish structures that do remain are those that were converted to Christian churches.

At the expulsion of 1492, all the Jewish gold and silver was confiscated and melted down for coins and bullion; this included all synagogue items like Torah crowns, pointers and even the thread from Torah covers. Only manuscripts, such as haggadot and prayer books, remain from that era, and are the only source of our knowledge of the Jews' plastic arts of the period.

Mann led the audience on a tour of discovery, tracing ritual and synagogue objects, and decorative motifs through Italy, Turkey, Hungary and even Switzerland. Because textiles were the most portable of the arts, motifs can be traced from mosaic floors in Israeli archeological sites through to rugs in western Europe.

Again, one of the strongest themes was the interconnectedness and mutual influence of Islamic, Christian and Jewish motifs in the art of the period.

The linguistic influences of the Golden Age were traced by Dr. Tracy K. Harris of Bradley University, who discussed the 500-year journey of Judeo-Spanish, one variant of which is known as Ladino.

As the Sephardim settled in the Mediterranean area after the expulsion, they took their language with them. Harris traced a story of linguistic survival and evolution, where it was the women who were instrumental in keeping this distinctly Jewish language alive through lullabies, songs and romances.

The fate of the language was intimately bound up with its public status, Harris said, and at one point, Judeo-Spanish was actually the international language of trade in the eastern Mediterranean.

She painted a picture of life in the former Ottoman Empire, where Judeo-Spanish language and culture played a major role.

Tay-Sachs clinics planned for Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Tay-Sachs clinics, the first to be held in Winnipeg in over 20 years, will take place early in the new year.

The clinics, co-sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women and Jewish Women International, are directed by University of Manitoba geneticist Dr. Cheryl Greenberg.

"I have been concerned that there has been no systematic community-based screening for Tay-Sachs here," Greenberg says. "I have been trying for the past 10 to 15 years to persuade various leaders in the community and organizations of the need for this, but I was unable to get it on anyone's agenda until now. I am pleased to be working with National Council and JWI on this program."

The gene abnormality that causes Tay-Sachs is present in people worldwide, Greenberg explains, but it is particularly common among Ashkenazi Jews. Both parents have to be carriers of the gene before a child is at risk.

Life expectancy for children with Tay-Sachs disease is five to ten years. Greenberg reports that the incidence has dropped dramatically since regular screening programs have been introduced in many communities.

The clinics will run Jan. 3 at the Rosh Pina Synagogue, and Jan. 17, at the Max and Rose Rady Centre.

Creating the Jewish Future

edited by Michael Brown and Bernard Lightman

Since World War II, Jews have experienced unprecedented acceptance. Now, as outside threats diminish, newer, more complex issues arise. Michael Brown and Bernard Lightman of the York University Centre for Jewish Studies gather writers from Europe, Israel, and North America to consider directions for the Jewish community in the 21st century. Writers from within and without the academy discuss faith, Israel, Diaspora culture, education, gender roles and demography, keeping theory and practice, the past and the present in careful balance. Its timeliness and depth make this book unavoidable reading for all who will shape the Jewish future.

Contributors include: Irving Abella, Robert Eisen, Jane Gerber, Hillel Halkin, Susan Handelman, Paula Hyman, Norma Joseph, Barry Kosmin, Seymour Mayne, W. Gunther Plaut, Aviezer Ravitsky, Michael Rosenak, Alvin Schiff, Michael Stanislawski, and Morton Weinfeld.

D.C. experience boosts student's prospects

By ADAM SHARON

Life can be funny sometimes. Recently, as a press corps member, I attended the Republican National Committee's (RNC) midterm election night party at the Ronald Reagan International Trade Centre.

My primary duty was to report regularly for various radio stations throughout the nation, with news from RNC headquarters. Armed with my bureau chief's cellular phone and wearing a yellow press badge, my colleagues and I spread out among a sea of giddy Republicans who were ready to celebrate a midterm election victory.

Initially, my reports described the euphoric feeling that enveloped the Reagan building. Four hours later, the crowd's mood and the tone of my reports had dramatically changed. The thinning crowd was disappointed. An overwhelming Republican victory had not materialized.

You are probably assuming that I am a veteran beltway reporter, that perhaps this was but another evening of political drama I have observed first hand. In reality, such thoughts are far from the truth. I am a 21-year-old university student studying foreign policy at American University's Washington Semester Program for the current fall semester. Three days a week, I attend lectures given by ambassadors, State Department and congressional officials, academics and non-governmental organization representatives, on such matters as Kosovo, Iraq and Afghanistan.

For the remaining two days, I intern with Ellen Ratner at Talk Radio News Service. Ratner is my colorful bureau chief who co-hosts Good Day USA, a nationally syndicated American morning show broadcast to over 110 radio stations. I book guests for her show, broadcast live news to station affiliates throughout the day and attend various newsworthy events around the city.

I have had my picture taken with Senator Bob Dole, attended a Louis Farrakhan press conference, interviewed pro-Tibetan freedom activists Richard Gere and Goldie Hawn, and from a 10-metre distance, I saw Yasser Arafat and Benjamin Netanyahu at the White House during their pre-Yom Kippur meeting.

Life can indeed be funny sometimes. "Yesterday," I was a McGill University student studying North American history, literature and economics. I traipsed to and from campus, acknowledging the same faces, passing the same buildings and socializing at the same places. In essence, I had a routine. Do not misunderstand; I thoroughly enjoyed this temporary sojourn in Montreal and will be returning in January to continue my undergraduate studies.

Living in Montreal has also been a great experience. I am a Montreal bagel convert, although I have remained loyal to my hometown hockey team, the Toronto Maple Leafs. I have improved my French, and even survived four days without power during a historic ice storm.

If, however, you can detect some cynicism, it would be misleading for me to deny it. Today, I am a reporter and foreign policy student living in a city brimming with vitality yet saturated in scandal. I travel from Capitol Hill to the White House or the State Department without hesitation, and probably now, without appreciation. Twice I have lunched with Charles Lichtenstein, a former U.S. deputy ambassador to the United Nation under Jeane Kirkpatrick, and countless times I have attended press secretary Joe Lockhart's media briefings live from the White House. (Perhaps you have seen me on television; I sit 10 rows behind Wolf Blitzer and Sam Donaldson!)

"Tomorrow," I will return to Montreal, and I expect to complete my BA in May of 2000. Already I have begun developing contacts for possible future employment or schooling opportunities. Perhaps I will work at the Canadian Embassy in Washington, at the United Nations, at the World Bank, or for NATO in Brussels. Perhaps I will proceed directly to a graduate school of international service and diplomacy. Luckily, that is a choice that I will have to make in the future.

Although this Washington experience has, hopefully, brightened my career opportunities, I must stress that it is not the city itself for which I have to be thankful. I came here knowing two people, both fellow McGill students currently enrolled in this program. I will leave, however, knowing many people from a variety of professions.

The phrase, nothing comes on a silver platter, is an overstated, trite cliché, perhaps because it is true. Success will not be conferred upon me. Rather,I will have to seek it out independently. All the while, I remain tickled at how funny life can be sometimes.

Adam Sharon is a CHAT graduate and currently in his third year at McGill University, where his major is North American Studies.

Students explore questions of fate

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Eighty students from across the city came together for a recent beit midrash to consider such weighty issues as whether or not God intervenes in cases of natural disaster.

The evening learning session, on the question of Who Controls Fate, was sponsored by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), and held at North York City Hall.

Keynote speaker Martin Lockshin, associate director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, addressed the students following their chevruta-style study (working with a partner) of Torah, Talmud and other Jewish sources, and subsequent small group discussions.

"What students teach themselves from the text is more important than what they hear from the teacher," said Lokshin.

The event was intended to be "something for everybody, an evening in which the entire spectrum of Jews can come together to...think about issues that have personal relevancy," said Lance Davis of JCS.

Facilitators for the small group discussions also represented a variety of denominational backgrounds.

"I really liked the interaction [with other students]," said Nathaniel Lipkus, a first-year University of Toronto student, "but I enjoyed the lecture as well."

In his keynote address, Lockshin quoted Rabbi Akiva, stating that "God knows everything ahead of time, but human beings have free will.

"We have to watch where we exercise our freedom of choice," he added, "and hopefully do it in a positive way."

JCS' first city-wide beit midrash was held in the spring. A third one is planned for the second half of the school year.

Penslar explores Jewish history at U of T

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"The study of Jewish history evokes in me powerful senses of familiarity and strangeness," explains Derek Penslar. "Within a single text – be it a bit of midrash, a memoir of a 17th century Jewish merchant or a Zionist manifesto – I feel empathy with my historical subjects, yet awe at the vast distance that separates us.

"I became a historian in order to bridge that gap – to understand the mental universes within which people have lived in times past," he adds.

Penslar, the first, newly appointed holder of the Samuel J. Zacks chair in Jewish history at the University of Toronto, has broad interests, ranging from Zionism and Israel to modern European Jewry.

He and his wife, Robin, an attorney, and their two children, Joshua and Talia, arrived in Toronto recently, fresh from Indiana University in Bloomington.

"Canada is the kinder, gentler America that George Bush used to talk about," says Penslar, 40, a native of Los Angeles and a graduate of Stanford University and the University of California in Berkeley.

The first college graduate in his family, he was drawn to his speciality after studying German history and literature at the Free University in Berlin and spending a year in Israel steeping himself in Zionist ideology.

For Penslar, Jewish history is infinitely fascinating. Jews, though small in number, form one of the world's great and influential civilizations. And the intellectual energy they have displayed down through the ages is nothing short of astonishing.

"I remember walking the streets of Tel Aviv and wondering how such a small people with so many disadvantages could have created all this. I've spent the past 20 years, perhaps, thinking about these issues."

A prolific scholar, Penslar is a regular contributor to academic journals, such as the Journal of Contemporary History and Jewish Social Studies, and he has written or is writing several books.

His first book, Zionism and Technocracy: The Engineering of Jewish Settlement in Palestine, 1870-1918, was based on his PhD dissertation, and was published in 1991. The central figure in Zionism and Technocracy, soon to be published in Hebrew, is Arthur Ruppin, a Zionist from Germany who planned Jewish settlements in Palestine. "If not for Ruppin, there wouldn't have been a state of Israel," he claims.

In 1997, Penslar contributed a chapter about Zionism and Israel to the Illustrated History of the Jewish People, a best-selling volume edited by a British historian

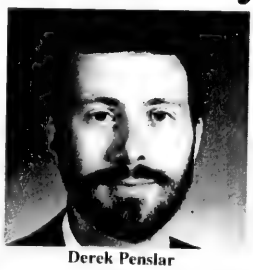
Later this year, Penslar's newest book, In Search of Jewish Community: Jewish Identity in Germany and Austria, 1918-1933, will roll off the presses.

And at the end of 1998, Penslar intends to finish Shylock's Children: The Jews, Economics and Ethnic Identity in Modern Europe.

In this work, he traces the history of modern Jewish economic thought and its effect on Jewish philanthropy, and analyzes the role of Jews' pride in and unease about their economic performance in the formation of a secular Jewish identity.

"This project has a great deal of contemporary relevance. Whether it's the Nation of Islam's anti-Semitic polemics about Jews and the slave trade, or Jews worrying about 'Jewish names' connected with a major financial scandal, the fact of Jewish economic distinctiveness is unavoidable, and I am interested in how Jews have dealt with this issue throughout history."

Currently, Penslar is working on his latest book, Imagining Israel: Zionism and the Jewish State, 1882-1967, a general account of the Zionist movement.



Derek Penslar

To Penslar, a moderately observant Jew who was associate director of Indiana University's Jewish studies program, Jewish studies at the university level are not like the regimen of a yeshiva.

"We teach about tradition, but not from within the tradition. Our approach is sympathetic, yet detached. There definitely is a potential for parochialism, but I have tried very hard to avoid it."

Penslar is delighted to be in the growing field of Israel studies, whose stature at the University of Toronto has been enhanced by the funding of a chair by Montreal businessman Charles Bronfman.

The chair has yet to be filled, and the university is still searching for a suitable candidate.

Penslar considers himself a Zionist, whom he defines as "someone who feels a deep personal attachment to Israel, and whose Jewish identity in good measure depends on that attachment."

When he was younger, he seriously considered living in Israel, but for practical and material reasons he did not go through with aliyah.

A labor Zionist, Penslar believes that secular Zionism, having achieved its goal of creating a strong Jewish state, is on its way out. By his estimation, secular Zionism is being supplanted by religious Zionism, whose mission of settling the Land of Israel is still unfolding.

He is critical not only of Jewish ultra-nationalists and Israeli messianists, but of leftists who disregard and disrespect Jewish tradition.

Although he is concerned by theocratic trends in Israeli society, Penslar strongly doubts whether Israel will metamorphose into a theocracy. "There are just too many forces working against it."

Penslar, who has taught a course on the Arab-Israeli conflict, can see no alternative to the Oslo peace process. Both sides, he feels, have made mistakes in trying to implement it.

He does not admire the current prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, whom he suspects of dragging out negotiations with the Palestinians.

"Every country gets the political leadership it deserves. Netanyahu is doing exactly what he said he would do."

Russian Jewish leaders debate worsening climate

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Responding to rising concern about the deteriorating climate of anti-Semitism in Russia, Jewish organizational leaders are grappling with how best to ensure the Jewish community's safety.

At a meeting this week, the governing board of the Russian Jewish Congress decided it would lobby the international community to halt contacts with Russia's Communist party because of its failure to censure one of its members of parliament, Albert Makashov, who made several public anti-Semitic statements earlier this fall.

But some members of the umbrella group are saying that the move does not go far enough, while others believe the threat of anti-Semitism has been overstated.

The debate over the extent of anti-Semitism in Russia and what steps to take in response comes against the backdrop of a deteriorating climate for Jews in Russia. In addition to Makashov's remarks and the Duma's failure to censure him, a lawmaker long supportive of Jewish interests, Galina Starovoitova, was assassinated last month.

Most leaders of the congress, which unites leading representatives of the business community, public figures and prominent rabbis, agree that the Russian Jewish leadership should carry out a low-profile political offensive against anti-Semitism.

"Our mission is not about loud public statements, but about pragmatic work inside and outside of Russia," Yevgeny Satanovsky, a member of the group's board, said after the closed meeting.

It was with this goal in mind that a majority of participants at the meeting supported the initiative of Vladimir Goussinsky, the group's president, to ask the U.S. Congress, the European parliament and legislative assemblies of major European nations to halt all contact with the 121 Communist and nationalist lawmakers who rejected the censure resolution, according to Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, a board member.

But some board members are questioning what positive impact these moves will have on Russian Jews.

"I don't feel that everything that could have been done was done," said Rabbi Berel Lazar, the chief emissary of the Lubavitch movement in Russia. "All this activity doesn't reassure the Jewish population and doesn't change the minds of the people on the street."

"It isn't enough to rely on support of the international community. Jews should get together and show that they are not afraid to express their opinion," agreed Tankred Golenpolsky, founder of Evreyskaya Gazeta, the leading Jewish newspaper in Moscow.

Golenpolsky advocates the idea of staging a mass Jewish rally in Moscow against fascism and anti-Semitism in Russia.

Yosef Kobzon, a popular singer and Jewish lawmaker who walked out of a parliamentary session saying he would not return until Makashov was suitably chastised, supports the idea of a rally – as does Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov. According to sources close to the mayor, Luzhkov said he would personally join in such a demonstration.

But most of the leaders of the congress rejected the proposal, saying it would jeopardize the safety of Russian Jews.

Jewish leaders also decided to approach Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov and Russian Prosecutor General Yuri Skuratov in an attempt to make them express a clear stand on anti-Semitism and take legal measures against Makashov and other ultranationalists.

Primakov has kept silent on the issue so far.

Skuratov announced last month that his agency had found evidence proving that Makashov's statements at several rallies earlier this fall incited ethnic strife – a crime punishable under Russia's criminal code. But the case has apparently stalled in the prosecutor's office.

Last week, Skuratov's deputy, Alexander Rozanov, announced that his agency has appointed an expert commission, consisting of psychologists, linguists and anthropologists, to decide whether Makashov's statements would fall under the code.

Meanwhile, Jewish leaders rejected a request from Communist party leader Gennady Zyuganov to meet with the Russian Jewish Congress leadership.

The board "decided not to meet with him until he takes an unambiguous position on Makashov" Goldschmidt said.

Zyuganov reportedly gave Makashov a mild dressing-down in private, but the Communist lawmaker was not thrown out of the party, as was originally promised.

In an attempt to improve his party's image, Zyuganov has met with Israel's ambassador to Russia and told him that Makashov's views are not those of his party. On a recent visit to Germany, Zyuganov also met with the leader of the Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis.

Most participants at the Jewish congress meeting said the situation for Jews in Russia is cause for concern but is not grave.

"In most places – especially in Moscow – anti-Semitism is not a problem for somebody walking in the street," said Lazar. "It should be understood that a lot of [current anti-Semitism] is politically connected and has to do with elections," he added.

Parliamentary elections are slated for late next year, and the presidential elections are planned for the summer of 2000.

Reports coming from some provincial centres suggest, however, that the economic crisis that hit Russia in August and the wide-ranging public debate over Makashov's remarks have contributed to an increase of anti-Semitism in various parts of the country.

Some residents of the Russian city of Novosibirsk recently found their mailboxes stuffed with anti-Semitic leaflets blaming Jews for Russia's economic hardships.

Pledge on Auschwitz crosses advances talks

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Jewish and Polish officials have moved a step closer to resolving a long-running dispute over religious symbols at Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Polish Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek last week pledged to remove 300 new crosses erected during the summer by radical Catholics at the site of the Nazi death camp.

In a letter to Jewish leaders who have been attempting during the last two years to work out a deal with the Polish government on the future of the memorial site, Buzek said the crosses would be removed "as soon as possible."

Polish officials are currently trying to remove the crosses through court action, but if that fails, Buzek said the government would adopt a new law enabling it to do so.

The crosses have stood as the latest stumbling block to efforts to work out a long-term plan to preserve and protect the concentration camps. Last year, a coalition of Jewish groups negotiated the removal of crosses and Stars of David from the area known as the Field of Ashes.

The coalition is still trying to work out an agreement concerning religious symbols just beyond the boundary of the camp, including a church with a 26-foot cross on top, another cross in front and a third large cross alongside the old Carmelite convent.

Jewish groups have long protested the presence of the religious symbols as disrespectful. But some radical Catholic groups consider the crosses – particularly the 26-foot cross that served as a backdrop to a 1979 papal mass – a symbol of the Nazis' Polish victims.

Jewish and Polish officials had discussed replacing the church cross with a less intrusive monument to the Poles who died there, but talks stalled when the 300 new crosses were erected this summer to protest the negotiations.

Jewish groups and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel said they were encouraged by the Polish prime minister's pledge, which a Polish official conveyed at a meeting of the coalition in Washington earlier this month.

The Jewish groups agreed to give the prime minister time to address the issue through the legislative process but emphasized they will not reopen the negotiations until the 300 crosses are removed.

Poland's pledge came as an outspoken critic of the plan for Auschwitz-Birkenau stepped up his criticism of museum officials involved in the negotiations.

New York Rabbi Avi Weiss, president of AMCHA, the Coalition of Jewish Concerns, leveled a blistering attack at a meeting of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council this week, arguing that no Christian symbols should be tolerated.

He also charged that museum officials have no right to negotiate international agreements and said he would work with Congress to ensure that federal dollars are used solely to fulfil the museum's mandate of education and remembrance.

Beyond the religious symbols, at issue in the negotiations is a plan to physically link Auschwitz and Birkenau with a walking path to induce more visitors to see Birkenau, where the vast majority of Jews were killed.

The talks are also aimed at balancing the commercial and development interests of the two towns – an important concern on the Polish side – against the Jewish imperative, as Miles Lerman, chair of the museum's council, has described it, of preserving "for posterity the sacredness, physical integrity and centrality of Jewish suffering and martyrdom at Auschwitz-Birkenau."

The Week in Israel

Dec. 7

• The speaker of the Knesset said he would boycott all official events for President Bill Clinton during the latter's stay in Israel. Dan Tichon said he was protesting the decision by the president not to visit the Knesset.

Dec. 8

• Calls increased from within Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's governing coalition for him to form a national unity government or to initiate early elections. The calls came amid growing political turmoil surrounding the continuing violent demonstrations in the West Bank. (Palestinians marked the 11th anniversary of the intifadah by staging further violent demonstrations throughout the week.)

Dec. 9

• A Knesset committee authorized rabbinical courts to impose sanctions on men who refuse to grant a get to their wives. The sanctions include barring such husbands exit from the country, suspending their driver's licence and freezing their bank and credit accounts.

•The Israeli army decided to court-martial a soldier who was beaten by a Palestinian mob last week near Ramallah. Corporal Assaf Miara, 19, is being charged with carrying an unloaded weapon and with leaving his base without permission. The army is not charging him for failing to fire upon his assailants.

Dec. 10

• Netanyahu ordered a crackdown on Palestinian unrest. It is "our duty to activate the army" to deal with the unrest "in the firmest way possible," he said.

• Signs reading "Clinton Go Home" and depicting him in an Arab headdress appeared on billboards and poster boards. Clinton was scheduled to arrive on Saturday night.

Dec. 11

• Netanyahu asked Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein to consider freezing legal proceedings against a number of students indicted for offences committed during their strike.

UN designates anti-Semitism as form of racism

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — A recent decision by the United Nations to consider anti-Semitism as a form of racism returns the world body to its roots on the human rights front.

The General Assembly unanimously approved a resolution to list anti-Semitism among other concerns to be investigated by a special UN monitor on racism, including racial incidents and discrimination "against blacks, Arabs and Muslims," xenophobia and "Negrophobia."

The Dec. 9 resolution came on the 50th anniversary of the UN's genocide convention and one day before celebrations of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, both of which were inspired, in large part, by the systematic murders perpetrated by the Nazi regime.

"Yesterday, this assembly reaffirmed that all forms of racism, including anti-Semitism, must be defeated in the struggle for human rights," UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan said at the ceremonies commemorating the human rights document.

"To the United Nations, this anniversary is more than a milestone," Annan said. "It is a mirror that reflects how far we have come, and how long we have to go."

Although the issue of specifically listing anti-Semitism was raised in Geneva several years ago, according to Israel's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations, Aaron Jacob, the Dec. 9 resolution is the first to specifically mention anti-Semitism.

General Assembly passes resolution unanimously

In November 1975, the General Assembly adopted a resolution declaring that "Zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination." The resolution was repealed in 1991, against the opposition of most Arab member-states.

In March, at a meeting in Jerusalem of the World Jewish Congress' (WJC) Israel Council on Foreign Relations, Annan had denounced all forms of anti-Semitism, and called the 1975 resolution on Zionism "lamentable." The resolution's adoption was "the low point in relations whose negative resonance, even today, is difficult to over-estimate," he said.

Jacob called the decision a "welcome development," one that was championed by the "intense efforts" of Jewish organizations in pushing for the resolution.

Turkey also played a role in the decision of the Arab and Muslim member-states to overcome their objections to the inclusion of the term in the resolution, originally put forth at the UN Human Rights Commission in Geneva.

The idea for a UN official to monitor forms of racism, including anti-Semitism, was the brainchild of Morris Abram, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva who now chairs UN Watch, a Geneva-based affiliate of the WJC.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, called the General Assembly's action "long overdue." In a statement, Foxman said the move is "particularly significant" in light of the fact that in 1995, the UN omitted "specific mention of the Jewish victims of World War II in a United Nations declaration marking the 50th anniversary" of the war's end.

The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide was the first human rights treaty adopted by the United Nations.

Raphael Lemkin, the international lawyer who coined the term "genocide," pressed for the treaty's adoption by the General Assembly in 1948.

Israeli court strikes down yeshiva draft deferrals

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court decision striking down the current system of granting army deferrals to yeshiva students could exacerbate the religious-secular divide here and put further strain on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's already tottering coalition.

Israel's High Court of Justice ruled last week that a Defence Ministry deferral program that currently has approximately 30,000 yeshiva students is illegal, and it gave the Knesset a year to pass a new law on the matter.

Ruling on petitions from the secularist Meretz party and the Israeli University Students Association, which sought to put a ceiling on the number of deferrals granted, the panel of 11 justices said that if the Knesset failed to pass legislation in the next 12 months, the current arrangement would be null and void.

The justices said the issue had created a growing sense of inequality in Israeli society.

The deferrals, which date from the status quo agreement that helped to usher in the founding of the State of Israel, have become a lightning rod in recent years.

In a bid to head off the petitions, Netanyahu established a panel in May headed by a retired Supreme Court judge. The panel was to examine the issue and try to come up with a solution acceptable to all parties. But the prime minister abandoned the idea after members of the haredi Agudat Yisrael party threatened to bring down the government if the panel were formed.

Commenting on last week's ruling, Netanyahu pledged that legislation agreeable to all Israelis, from the secular to the Haredim, would be passed within the one-year deadline.

"This must be done to prevent a rift in the people. It won't be easy, but it can be done," he said.

Knesset member Avraham Ravitz of the United Torah Judaism bloc (UTJ), who has been involved in an effort to resolve the issue, also welcomed the ruling.

"I think the Knesset will discuss the matter, and [legislators] will be receptive to each other. We are aware of what everyone's red lines are, and we are trying very hard not to cross them," he said.

Labor party leader Ehud Barak, who drew the ire of some Orthodox lawmakers earlier this year when he authored a bill that would limit the number of deferrals, said there had already been contacts with haredi representatives on the issue.

Israel's chief rabbis also welcomed the ruling, as did President Ezer Weizman, who has spoken out in the past against the deferrals.

But in reactions signaling the tough battle that may lie ahead, some haredi rabbis warned that they would not agree to a decision to draft any yeshiva students and would direct them either to go to jail or to leave Israel, rather than serve in the army.

Knesset member Rabbi Avraham Leizerson of UTJ called the ruling an "inquisition" and said yeshiva students would overcome the latest attempt by the State of Israel to draft the students.

Program affects 30,000 students

In their petition, Chaim Oron and Amnon Rubinstein of Meretz had argued that the arrangement implemented 50 years ago by Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, to exempt "a few thousand" yeshiva students from military service had evolved into a rubber stamp, exploited by tens of thousands of yeshiva students.

The two Knesset members demanded that a ceiling be set on the number of deferrals issued yearly, and that those individuals be closely monitored to ensure they continue their studies and do not go to work.

In 1954, the year the status quo agreement was signed, some 400 yeshiva students were granted deferrals. Today, roughly 2,800 students receive them each year.

Oron said he planned to introduce into the Knesset a law based on the petition, which says there must be a ceiling on deferrals and that the deferrals must be closely monitored.

According to the army, only 55 percent of 18-year-olds in Israel are currently drafted. Of the remaining 45 percent, some 21 percent are Israeli Arabs, who do not serve, and eight percent are yeshiva students.

Jewish woman new Swiss president

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A Jewish woman is scheduled to record a double first in Switzerland this week.

Ruth Dreifuss is expected to become the first Jew – and the first woman – to be named president of Switzerland, where women only earned the right to vote in 1971.

Dreifuss, who formally becomes head of state on Jan. 1, will inherit a country that is attempting to cope with an anti-Semitic backlash.There has been a stream of embarrassing disclosures in recent years about the financial ties that existed between the country's leading banks and Nazi Germany.

After months of international pressure, two of the banks agreed earlier this year to pay a $1.25 billion settlement of Holocaust-era claims.

Dreifuss, 58, was born in an eastern Swiss canton. As the Nazis approached the Swiss border, she moved with her parents to Geneva.

She spent her early career as a secretary in a hotel and as a journalist with a weekly newspaper in Basel, the site of the First Zionist Congress in 1897. In 1965, she joined the Socialist Party.

In 1970, she graduated from Geneva University with a degree in mathematics, and was then appointed an assistant in the faculty of economic and social Sciences at Geneva University.

She served in the Swiss Development Corporation at the Swiss Foreign Ministry from 1972 to 1981, when she was elected secretary of the Federation of Swiss Trade Unions.

Dreifuss was a member of the Berne Municipal Council from 1989 to 1992, and was appointed home affairs minister in 1993.

She is fluent in French, German, English, Spanish and Italian.

The presidency of Switzerland is a largely ceremonial post. The president is not elected by popular vote. The office rotates among the seven Cabinet ministers of the Swiss federal government.

Rescue mission

Speaking with a somber-faced U.S. president at his side, the prime minister called the plans a "gross violation of the Oslo and Wye accords."

Netanyahu also called on the PA to immediately halt its "propaganda" campaign, that Israel was reneging on the terms of the Wye accord by refusing to release Palestinians jailed for anti-Israel activities.

Clinton struck a theme of reconciliation during his remarks at the news conference. "The promise of Wye cannot be fulfilled by violence or by statements or actions which are inconsistent with the whole peace process," Clinton said. "Both sides should adhere to that."

Underscoring what he called America's "unshakable" commitment to Israeli security, Clinton announced he would submit a request to the U.S. Congress for an additional $1.2 billion in aid to help Israel cover the costs of carrying out the West Bank redeployments called for under the Wye accord.

The president said the PA had taken some steps toward fulfilling their commitments under the accord. But at the same time, he added that they "could be doing better to prevent violent demonstrations in the street."

During the past week, there have been a series of violent clashes in the West Bank between Palestinian demonstrators and Israeli troops over protesters' demands for the release of Palestinian activists held in Israeli jails.

Palestinian officials have maintained that Israel broke a term of the Wye agreement when the majority of those the Jewish state recently released from prison were common criminals. Israel, in turn, claimed it was living up to the agreement – a view echoed by some American officials.

Two Palestinians died last week in clashes near the West Bank town of Kalkilya, bringing the total number of fatalities during the past week to four.

The Palestinian Authority clamped down on the demonstrations prior to Clinton's arrival. But the violence continued Sunday when a 17-year-old Israeli girl was moderately wounded after being stabbed in the back outside the West Bank settlement of Shavei Shomron.

Her assailant, a 15-year-old Palestinian girl, told investigators after she was apprehended that she had acted alone. She added that she decided to attack a Jew after reading from the Koran the previous day.

Prior to Clinton's visit, Israel carried out the first phase of the redeployment under the Wye accord, transferring an additional nine percent of West Bank land to Palestinian control.

But, Israel said it was suspending further implementation of the Wye agreement pending Palestintian fulfilment of its commitments under the accord.

A key Israeli demand called for the Palestine National Council to formally vote, during a meeting that Clinton attended, to nullify the anti-Israel clauses in the Palestinian charter.

Palestinian officials countered that the Wye accord called only for attendees at the meeting to approve by acclamation, a letter that PA Chairman Yasser Arafat sent to Clinton in January, indicating that the clauses were annulled.

Clinton's visit to the Gaza Strip for the meeting has been a source of anger for right-wing Israelis – some Cabinet ministers among them – who claim it will give support to Palestinian aspirations for statehood.

After his talks with Netanyahu, Clinton held a meeting with Israeli President Ezer Weizman.

The president is accompanied on the trip by First Lady Hillary Clinton and their daughter, Chelsea.

On Sunday, the Clintons visited the grave of slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, accompanid by Rabin's widow, Leah.

Chelsea Clinton made visits to the Western Wall, the Temple Mount and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Senior citizens face unique dental problems

TORONTO — Many dentists are uncomfortable dealing with dental problems uniques to seniors, says Dr. Jonathan Center, who has worked with seniors at Mount Sinai Hospital, the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

These problems may include complications due to multiple medications, dry mouth and abnormal behavior.

Center and Dr. John Gasner, who has worked at Mount Sinai Hospital and has served as acting head of dentistry at Baycrest Centre, have teamed up to form LifeSmiles, a specialized dental clinic for seniors.

"We established this clinic to address the specialized needs of seniors of all ages," says Center.

"People are keeping their teeth longer and they are recognizing the importance of oral health. There is [also] an awareness of the need to deal with the complicated medical histories of many seniors," he says.

Seniors require dentists, he says, who are versed in medical conditions and medications, and who are prepared to interact with the patient's doctors, pharmacist, family members and care-givers.

The team at LifeSmiles has been active in teaching seniors how to maintain a healthy mouth. It has presented seminars and classes at seniors' facilities including Earl Bales Seniors' Centre, Lifestyles and Pine Villa.

In the presentations, which include slides and demonstrations, the dentists emphasize the reasons for healthy oral care – to maintain good nutrition, detect health problems and maintain self-confidence.

Poor oral health can lead to mouth infections which in turn can lead to infections in other parts of the body, says Center. "Bacteria from the mouth can enter the blood stream and settle in prosthetic joints."

Intra-oral cameras

This can lead to serious medical problems, particularly with seniors who have artificial knees, hip joints, weak heart valves or other orthopedic or medical problems, he says.

"Through extensive interaction with seniors, we have found that many of them do not visit dentists regularly, and we have detected uncared for medical problems," he says.

"A caring relationship is very important in order to gain the trust of senior patients. Taking time to develop this relationship will, in turn, lead to better results in treatment. By using intra-oral cameras, we show our patients, as well as family members and care-givers, the problems."

Patients with cognitive impairments such as dementia, Alzheimer disease or other disabilities, require specialized treatment, and those who manage the patient at home often need in-depth training in how to care for the senior's teeth, he says.

Denture therapy goes beyond laboratory work, says Center. "Along with dental knowledge and a superior denture product, the patient requires ongoing monitoring to avoid future gum problems."

Dry mouth is one of the most common complaints in seniors because there are hundreds of medications that seniors take for heart, nerves or other ailments that reduce the saliva flow.

There are special toothpastes and gels that we prescribe to help combat these problems, says. Center. "Often, just brushing their teeth is a problem for patients who have a loss of manual dexterity or other functions, or just a lack of patience."

In dealing with seniors," says Center, "the dentist must not be rushed with the patient, and he must have the ability to gather information effectively."

Film producer wrestles with documentary's 'Hit'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Producer David Ostriker, a principal and vice-president of television at High Road Productions, is not one to rest on his laurels, but these days he's taking time to savor the sweet taste of a success.

His latest project, Hitman Hart: Wrestling with Shadows, has been a hit with North American television critics, garnering rave reviews in both the United States and Canada. The documentary about professional wrestling features Canadian wrestler Bret "Hitman" Hart. It debuted on TVOntario this month and will air on the A&E Network Dec. 20 at 9 p.m.

Ostriker, who served as executive producer of the project, is quick to praise Paul Jay for his work as director and co-producer of the film.

Jay is also a principal in High Road – he's the founding president of what Ostriker says is one of the "hottest" documentary film companies in Canada.

Taking me on a tour of High Road, a full-service production house located in a sprawling mansion on Jarvis Street, Ostriker, who is Orthodox, says his office is easily identifiable, because it is the only room in the building with a mezuzah on the door. Jay is Jewish but not observant.

Ostriker, who is in his third year with High Road, was previously a producer at Associated Producers and Stornway Productions. He says that in his 30 years in the film business, Wrestling with Shadows is his biggest success. "I never had anything that big. Nothing close."

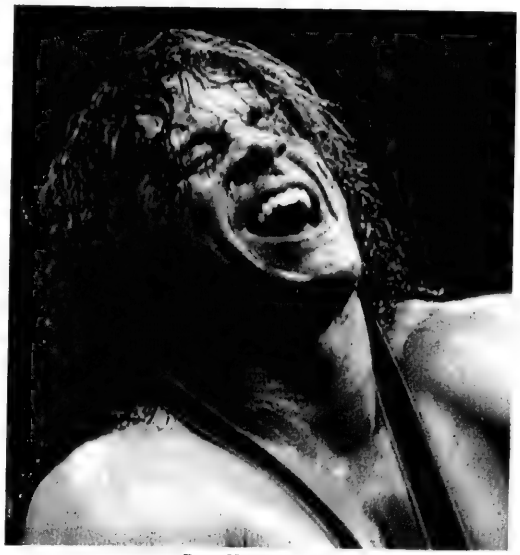
He attributes the appeal of the film to the fact that the story revolves around a compelling protagonist.

Describing Hart as "charismatic" and calling him "the best-known Canadian in the world today," Ostriker notes that more than half a billion people around the world watch wrestling. In cable TV, wrestling has the highest ratings of any show, and this, he explains, is the reason the documentary was eagerly snapped up by broadcasters in most countries across Europe.

But he stresses that the film will also be of interest to people who are not wrestling aficionados, because the story deals with good and evil, and offers new insights into pro-wrestling as a result of the special access Jay had to the sport through his relationship with Hart.

The film has a powerful dramatic climax, which according to Ostriker was pure serendipity. Hart had a disagreement with the World Wrestling Federation (WWF) during their contract negotiations while the film was being shot, and the experience became part of the story.

"Good and evil took on real qualities... HaShem was smiling on us," Ostriker says.



Bret 'Hitman' Hart

Sales of the video have been brisk, Ostriker says. "We're selling 300 to 400 units a day on the Internet, while 20,000 have been distributed to retail stores across Canada."

This sort of commercial success of a documentary video is "unheard of," he says, and he expects sales to increase after the film airs in the United States, where the video has been sold to Walmart's main distributor.

High Road has doubled its production every year for the last three years, Ostriker says.

One of its best-known works, Never-Endum Referendum, a documentary about nationalism and personal identity in Quebec, was directed by Jay for CTV in 1997.

There are many projects in the works for various networks, both American and Canadian, Ostriker says, among them, The Machine Gun, a three-part series on the history of the machine gun; Yesterday's Tomorrow which traces the evolution of modern technology through the world fairs; Through Thick and Thin a documentary about eating disorders; and A Warrant for Genocide, which examines the history and impact of the ant-Semitic pamphlet, Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Video helps young people understand the Holocaust

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The story of two young brothers who survived while two women died of starvation in the same hiding place in the forest, is told in Goodbye My Shtetl – Rotikna.

The hour-long video was made by Samuel Levinson, 73, and Alexander (Sasha) Levin (Levinson), 65, to help young people understand the Holocaust.

The hour-long video also recalls the black days in Russia when Jews were not allowed to speak to foreigners, and were grilled by KGB agents if they did.

This happened to Sasha in 1964, when he was in the Russian army, and he was told to go to Moscow to meet his sister-in-law, Chaya Levinson, from Toronto.

"I was afraid to speak to her, and we communicated though a person who knew Yiddish, but the KGB were watching and interrogated me later."

However, the clandestine meeting bore fruit, because 10 years later, in 1974, Sasha came to Canada through his brother's efforts.

The film also tells the story of how the two brothers were separated for 30 years without knowing the other was alive. A third brother, Nathan, also survived, but died a few years ago in Israel.

A fourth brother, Moishe, then 5, and their parents Mordecai and Mindel, were killed by the Nazis in 1942.

"We cooked potatoes but did not eat them until they were cold so they would last longer," says Levin, recalling their wartime experience.

"We had to steal the potatoes because most of the farmers would not even open their doors they were so afraid. We got down on all fours along the rows of potatoes to imitate how the wild boars did it so the farmers would not be suspicious. We also ate berries to keep alive."

Also appearing in the video are two survivors who hid in the same forest excavation as the two brothers – Lowa (Larry) Gamilka of Montreal, who was only seven at the time, and Yona (Taibele) Wasserman of Toronto, then age two. A story about Rotikna in The CJN, Oct. 15, 1977, reunited the four after more than 50 years.

The Levins and their companions survived for nearly two years in the forest, returning to Rotikna in 1944, only to find their family had died along with 18,000 other Jews at Sarna.

Sasha became separated from his brothers after he was ordered into the Russian army.

The brothers returned to Rotikna in 1995, along with a group of Israelis. By then, the one-time Jewish population of 1,630 was reduced to two. Only the foundation stones of the Levin house remained. The film they took of their old haunts is part of the video.

Miriam David, daughter of Samuel Levinson, also went to Rotikna. She says in the video that she now understands why her Jewish roots are important, a message underlined as well by Motty Levinson, her brother.

An absorbing scene, shot in G. Ross Lord Park in North York, shows their children, Elise, 9, and Michael, 12, talking about how their grandfather survived.

"I hope the Holocaust never happens again," says Elise.

The video was made by Tokmakov TV Productions Ltd. North York. The brothers hope it will be shown in the coming months on CFMT, Cable 4, and the History and Showcase channels.For information, call Sasha Levin, 905-660-6192.

A Mystic destination

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

MYSTIC, Conn.— Whether one approaches by land or water, visitors to Mystic Seaport, located in this tiny Connecticut town, know they are close to one of New England's most popular travel spots when the towering masts of docked schooners are in sight.

Walking through the entrance, each step brings one further back in time, to an era when men would hoist 1,200 pound sails 100 feet above the decks of whaling, merchant and fishing schooners.

For those interested in maritime history, Mystic Seaport – the Museum of America and the Sea – is the destination of choice.

With more than 480 vessels, Mystic Seaport holds the largest collection of ships and boats in the world. The Charles W. Morgan, (considered Mystic Seaport's centrepiece exhibit) is a national historic landmark, and America's last surviving wooden whale ship. Also on site, is the largest single collection of maritime photography in the world.

Wandering the 40-acre site, one explores the wooden wonders of the past, and witnesses the process of wooden ship construction.

Through the main entrance to the left, is the Henry B. duPont Preservation Shipyard, which houses a wide range of trinkets, artifacts and pieces of shipbuilding of years gone by. Its aluminum roof, covering wooden beams, preserves the raw beginnings of ship construction.

Visitors can explore the decks and cabins of the Charles W. Morgan (1841), Joseph Conrad (1882) and the L. A. Dunton (1921). They remain the same as they were when sailors went out to sea for years at a time.

On the Morgan, one can examine the captain's quarters from 150 years ago. The modest quarters are luxury compared with the small bunk beds housing the crew. Walking down two decks, the darkness closes in as the natural light remains far above.

Walking down one of the "main" streets on the site, one can visit the nautical instruments store which holds clocks, chronometers and navigational aids of the 1870s. Also worth visiting are the drug store, the bank and the cooperage.

The grounds also house a children's museum which is based around the theme of It's a Sailor's Life for Me. Children seven and under, can swab the deck, move cargo, cook in the galley, dress in sailors' garb and sleep in sailors' bunks.

Steven Spielberg's filming of Amistad included the collection of historic buildings at Mystic Seaport as a stand-in for New Haven.

For the next two years, visitors will be able to witness the $3.1 million (US) project to re-create this now-famous 81-foot schooner, Amistad, being built in the Museum's Henry B. duPont Preservation Shipyard.

Visitors should take the walk to the upper observation deck of the Amistad exhibit to fully observe and appreciate a reconstruction project of this nature. The above deck also has a series of displays of tools and designs.

If the urge to set sail is irresistible, and the pocketbook allows (an extra fee of $3.50 for adults and $2.50 for youths is required) one can tour the local waters on the 57-foot steamboat Sabino (1908) which is the last coal-fired, steam-powered passenger ferry operating in the United States, and is a national historic landmark. The cruises run from mid-May to mid-October.

Mystic Seaport is more than a collection of vessels and recreation of the New England shipping industry of 150 years ago. The site also houses diverse collections which include important holdings in many disciplines such as art, artifacts, tools, buildings, imprints and other documents. The art and object collection contains over 153,000 individual items or collections of items, of American and foreign origin.

The site also offers both formal and informal education programs, including programs for visitors, tours, sail education, classes in maritime skills, educational symposia, study tours, overnight programs for youth and schools groups, planetarium programs, and teacher training institutes.

Visitors often spend a day or more at Mystic Seaport. The site is open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., April through October. Admission is $16 (US) for adults, $8 for youth ages 6-12 years, and free for children 5 and under.

Mystic Seaport is located one mile south of Interstate 95 in Mystic, Conn.

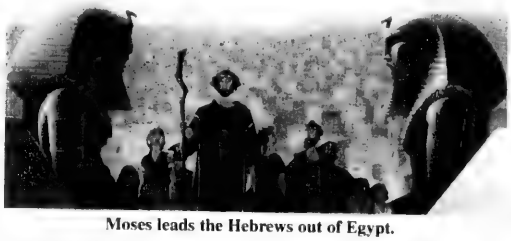
Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone



Moses leads the Hebrews out of Egypt.

MORE THOUGHTS ON THE PRINCE OF EGYPT

As theatres across North America prepare for the Dec. 18 opening of Dreamwork's animated musical feature The Prince of Egypt, the studio's three cinematic wizards – Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen – are hoping that their dynamic take on the Exodus saga will generate big magic at the box office.

Given the broad appeal of recent animated musicals such as Anastasia and Aladdin, The Prince of Egypt may very well earn a splendid return on its production cost of $70 million (US). Undeniably, the picture packs a powerful wallop. The story, after all, comes from the Bible. The visual look is stunning, conjuring up the influence of artists like Gustave Dore and Claude Monet, and cinematographer David Lean.

The soundtrack offers the voices of some of our most celebrated dramatic actors (Val Kilmer, Ralph Fiennes, Michelle Pfeiffer). The music, composed by Hollywood's best and brightest, and performed by the likes of Whitney Houston and Boyz II Men, is equally compelling.

At times, the picture unfolds with the lushness of a dream, weaving an intermittent spell from the moment we see the baby Moses floating perilously down a river in a reed basket.

During the requisite parting-of-the-Red-Sea scene, a whale swims across one of the miraculously suspended curtains of water, inspiring another burst of awe. There are many such moments.

The Queen discovers Moses floating on the Nile.

The Prince of Egypt invites comparisons to Cecil B. de Mille's 1956 four-hour epic The Ten Commandments, which immortalized Charlton Heston as Moses, and Yul Brynner as Pharoah. One might say that both productions are extraordinarily ambitious, both succeed strongly on their own terms, and both, to varying degrees, Hollywoodize the character of Moses.

In contrast to the De Millean epic, which cast Moses into an adulterous relationship with Pharoah's wife, The Prince of Egypt focuses on the relationship between Moses and Rameses, the Pharoah-in-waiting, who grew up as brothers in the royal court. They are like rambunctious suburban teenagers, borrowing the family chariots and getting into trouble.

While many exciting sequences explode like fireworks upon our senses, don't expect any brilliant flashes of insight into the Exodus story. Despite all the talent behind it, The Prince of Egypt presents what is essentially a shallow and cartoonish interpretation of the classic tale of the Jewish liberation from bondage in Egypt.

Too many significant details have been bleached from the narrative, along with too many delicious ironies, mysteries, subtleties and subplots.

In this version, Moses' mother, Jochabed, is not called into service as his wet nurse in Pharoah's palace. Moses murders the Egyptian slave driver only by accident, and in full public view. And since Moses has no speech impediment, Aaron becomes just an extraneous sidekick. Sadly, God fares little better.

The script lacks eloquence, and the characterizations are equally flat; the children of Israel are like cardboard cutouts. The comic talents of Martin Short and Steve Martin are wasted on two court magicians. When Moses attempts to bedazzle Pharoah by turning his staff into a snake, these court magicians sing You're Playing With The Big Boys, a silly Broadwayesque number that reeks of a 1990s corporate mentality.

Another egregious lapse into the contemporary mindset occurs when Moses sings All I Ever Wanted. Since when is the Exodus an expression of the prophet's own egotistical ambitions and desires?

Despite its flaws, The Prince of Egypt will likely stand as an impressive pyramid in cinematic history. Armies of artists, computer technicians and others poured their utmost into the work, the first major animated musical feature to be made on a Biblical theme. It's worth seeing for all it does right. Youngsters are certain to be enthralled.

Play focuses on Judenrat head

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Writer

TORONTO — Was Chaim Rumkowski, head of the Lodz ghetto Judenrat, so deluded that he believed the old, the ill and the children were really being sent by the Germans to farms and factories?

To be credible, Suffer the Children, a play by Prof. Maurice Breslow of Queen's University, depends on the acceptance of this delusion.

"If I've failed to convince you that this delusion was legitimate, I've failed as a playwright," he told the audience at the Bathurst Jewish Centre after a reading of his play, which won the Jewish Theatre Committee's award. It was also performed at the Bloor JCC that night.

Aside from this delusion, which many will find hard to swallow, Breslow has written a workmanlike play with believable dialogue, although one survivor in the audience who was at Lodz said Rumkowski was not as cruel as he was depicted in the play.

A native of Boston, Breslow has been teaching drama at Queen's for 25 years. Most of his father's family was wiped out in the Holocaust. With the aid of a translator, he researched Yiddish documents at YIVO in New York.

"For me," said Breslow, "Rumkowski embodied the best and the worst in our confrontation with the Nazis."

The best parts of Suffer the Children deal with Rumkowski's adeptness at the tailoring business, how he convinced the Nazis to let the ghetto workers make 200,000 camouflage suits for the Germans. How he negotiated a better price and delivery date is believable.

Not so, however, are the adoring children from the orphanage who sing Rumkowski's praises as Mordechai in the Purim play. The Purim shpiel seems to clutter up the play.

There are veiled references to Rumkowski's first and second marriages and to the fact that he had no children. Why didn't the playwright explore this?

Syd Libman as Rumkowski, Matt Reid as Elman, Jessica Ehrenworth as Mirka the ghetto orphan, Joel Rose as the S.S. commander, and Ralph Wintrob as the ghetto administrator, all did a fine job with their parts.

Perhaps because he had to sit in a chair throughout the play, Libman seemed unable to rise above the tragic overtones of his character and bring humor to the part as the author intended.

Breslow believes that after 4½ years in the Lodz ghetto, Rumkowski was transported to Auschwitz and killed there by Jews, though this is not in the play, which ends with Rumkowski, shorn of all his privileges, being kicked out of his office.

Luminaries celebrate Festival of Lights

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

For most of us, the eight days of Chanukah will most likely be spent twirling dreidles, flipping latkes, and lighting our special menorahs. We inquired how four, very diverse luminaries plan to celebrate the Miracle of Lights.

Guidy Mamann

Guidy Mamann is a partner at Mamann & Kranc (immigration lawyers), and the president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS).

"My wife is expecting! We're getting pretty close to the big day, so we'll be spending the holidays looking for baby furniture. Our three-year-old Hannah, will be spending her first Chanukah at school this year, at Or Haemet."

Mamann insists that doughnuts are his favorite Chanukah treat. "My mom makes special donuts for the holidays, which we eat with sugar and honey. We'll be lighting the candles on Hannah's very own menorah. I doubt we'll let her light it yet, but we got it at our shul auction, where everyone donates wonderful Judaic artifacts."

Al Waxman

"We're mall-rats, we go to every party at every mall. We make sure that we don't miss a single Chanukah party in town."

They are planning to spend next Chanukah at the new cultural centre, at Steeles and Bathurst, that JIAS is building.

Rona Maynard

Rona Maynard, editor of Chatelaine magazine will be busy over the holidays. "I will be working feverishly on the re-design of Chatelaine, which will be introduced effective with the March issue. We're caught up in it, totally. It's the biggest, and most exciting project undertaken here since the launch of the magazine in 1928!"

Maynard admits that growing up in Durham, N.H., (a small college town), they never observed Chanukah. "No dreidels, no latkes, no nothing. I didn't set foot in a synagogue, since there wasn't one in my town, until I was an adult. I do enjoy certain aspects of Jewish culture. I guess I have a certain feeling about Yiddish sayings, etc."

Maynard is married, with a 27- year-old son, and a 2-year-old grandson. "I didn't expect to be a grandmother this soon, but he's adorable!"

Lisa Cherniak, founder and executive director of Artists Against Racism (AAR) confides that her favorite things about this holiday are being forced not to make business calls, since no one's around; going skiing; playing with her nephew Arin and her niece Lauren; and going to a family Chanukah party, probably at her sister Debbie's.

"I go skiing anywhere it's not too cold," Cherniak says, "and where the hills take me at least 10 minutes to get down, although I haven't gone in seven years. I enjoy going to the movies on Christmas Eve with all the other Jewish people, trying to find an empty theatre! The downer is getting no e-mail that day! But one other good point is adding up the funds raised (for AAR) from our holiday Internet auction."

Since she's also a journalist, she's looking forward to this year's Chanukah present – a broadcast-quality video camera, to enable her to film a documentary next year.

"I'll also use the holidays to design AAR's movie theatre and movie magazine ads."

Renowned director and thespian, Al Waxman says "I'll only be here (in Toronto) with my family, for the first day of Chanukah, and happily I'll be having the best potato latkes in the world, provided by my wife." (The secret of his very successful diet? "One latke less!")

"Hopefully the latkes will have lined my stomach and my soul, and warmed me for Winnipeg weather."

He's off to Winnipeg to start rehearsals for a Neil Simon poignant, comedic play called Proposals. The play will run at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, in Toronto, in February and March.

For Waxman, cherished memories of Chanukah past, meant Chanukah gelt. In those days it was wonderful. It was a big score if you got a quarter...mostly it was a nickle or a dime.

Doing the write thing

By PERLITA ETTEDGUI
Special to The CJN

I didn't really know what to expect when I embarked on a flight to Jerusalem on Nov. 14. With 50 other Jewish journalism students headed to

Commentary

Israel in the middle of the night, anything was possible.

The program I went on was a World Zionist Organization-sponsored tour, called Do The Write Thing, and it granted university students from across North America the opportunity to become part of the world press at one of the Jewish community's most exciting and important annual events.

This year, in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, the General Assembly of United Jewish Federations (GA) from across the United States and Canada, convened in Jerusalem to discuss and examine the relationship between the Diaspora and Israeli Jewish communities. With a pen in hand and a very eager heart, I was there to cover the proceedings.

I was at the extravagant opening ceremonies at the International Convention Centre, where 3,000 of the most influential and involved Jews celebrated their achievements, and looked forward to a week of intense cross-cultural interaction.

I was there when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the Diaspora Jews on the importance of their commitment to Israel, on the firmness with which he would hold on to an often questioned peace process, and on the awesome hurdles Israel has already achieved.

I was there to hear international philanthropist Charles Bronfman, and Minister of Industry and Trade Natan Sharansky, announce the introduction of a program that will give Jewish youth across the globe the gift of a trip to Israel as their birthright.

I was there to meet with representatives of the American Jewish Press Association who discussed their experiences with us as if they were handing down a torch of wisdom to the next generation.

I was there to hear Amos Radian, adviser to Ehud Olmert, speculate on the effects of the proposed building on Har Choma set to begin in the next few months, and to question Foreign Minister Yaacob Levy on the state of Wye. Perhaps most importantly, I was there to witness and sign my name on a covenant between Israeli and North American Jews, "...rededicating to strengthen the links between us by creating personal relationships and active involvement."

For an aspiring journalist and an active member of the Jewish community, these experiences were priceless in exposing me to the primary sources of information and facts I often try to dissect from thousands of miles away. During one week in Jerusalem, I was able to gather a more concrete understanding of the working infrastructure of the country than I have in countless hours behind books here.

With days full of lectures focusing on issues like the Experiences of Ethiopian Olim, Women in Israel and the Diaspora, and Enhancing Jewish Unity, the conference covered a varied and wide spectrum of viewpoints. Having the ability to question those at the heart of the issues, is not often a luxury student journalists are afforded, but at this conference we were simply journalists, with all the freedom of approach and capability that title encompasses.

As a member of the Diaspora Jewish community with strong Zionist sentiments, and a former resident of the country, the experience I had last week in Israel left me with the very simple emotion of pride. At a time when both the American and Canadian embassies were warning tourists to avoid the "unstable" country because of yet another Iraqi-American showdown of wills, thousands of powerful Jews left the comforts of their homes, and descended on the hills of Jerusalem, on a selfless mission to discuss their collective fate.

This GA, more than anything else for me, proved that much of the cynicism one encounters regarding the hope for Israel is nothing more than rhetoric. When it came time for action, Jews came out in swarms from their dispersed pockets to help themselves and each other.

These delegates did not have to convene in Jerusalem to learn of the peace process, to discuss where fundraising efforts should be concentrated, and to discuss methods of bringing more youth to visit the land.

The fact that they came anyway seems to me a crystal communication of the commitment of a people whose bonds remain firm, despite the thousands of borders that separate them from each other.

If there was one central message gathered from the conference, it was that of the importance of active involvement in issues crucial to all Jews. Whether they were of Orthodox, Conservative or Reform affiliation, it seemed quite clear last week that the future of Israel was of paramount concern to all representatives of Diaspora Jewry.

Somehow, this tiny piece of land in the middle of a desert millions of miles away, became much more than a symbol of sovereignty these past 50 years. For the Jews at the GA, the land was a piece of evidence of the struggles, triumphs and challenges an evolving people shared.

As journalists whose minds were pumped with a wealth of information and perspectives, the group of university students I was a part of, more than probably, are sitting at their computers this day attempting to share their own experiences through the written word.

Writing for campus papers across North America and any other publication that will listen, the GA has certainly sparked a fire within us that will propel us to write on the issues of importance within Israel, and those of influence outside the state. I know for myself, the opportunity was not a wasted one, because I have never written so much about such a small period of time.

Slick centre adds speed to Greyhounds' lineup

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This weekend will mark a unique event in hockey history. Not quite as rare as an asteroid slamming into the earth or the Leafs winning an Eastern Division game, but pretty close anyway.

Consider this: how often do you get to see two young Jewish hockey players toiling in the country's top junior league, lock horns in a mano-a-mano confrontation?

It'll happen this weekend, when the Barrie Colts, with power forward Michael Henrich in the lineup, take to the ice against the Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds, with the slick skating Cory Pecker centring the second line.

Henrich gained national attention last summer when TV commentators told a national audience on NHL draft day that the Thornhill teenager is considered a role model for other Jewish hockey players. Henrich was selected in the first round by the Edmonton Oilers.

Pecker is a lesser-known commodity, but that is likely to change. First, however, he must overcome last year's disappointing rookie season in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) caused by a severe illness that hospitalized him.

Things were bright for Pecker as he looked at his first year in the OHL. He had been drafted by the Greyhounds in the OHL's first round from Lac St. Louis Midgets AAA. A native of Dollard des Ormeaux in Montreal, Pecker had chosen to continue his hockey career in Ontario to be closer to his family, which was in the process of moving to Toronto.

He came out of Quebec with impressive credentials. He'd only been on skates for four years, putting on his first pair at age 12. Luckily for him, he was a natural. He scored 86 goals in his first year of competitive hockey as an atom.

Blessed with natural scoring talent, it was more of the same in peewee and bantam. By the time he was suiting up for Lac St. Louis, he knew he had a realistic chance of making it as a professional. In his one and only year as a midget, he scored 30 goals and added 40 assists.

Junior teams took notice, and he was drafted as an under-age player by the Greyhounds when he was only 15. Pecker was happy to move to the OHL, because "we figured it would be better for my development."

Before he moved to the Hounds, Pecker got a taste of international hockey played in a Mediterranean setting. He was asked to try out for the Canadian team heading for the Maccabiah Games in Israel. Although he was surprised to be asked – "I didn't think I had a chance, I was so young" – he impressed team management. Charles Henry, former GM of the Hull Olympiques, who put together the Maccabiah team, raved about Pecker's abilities.

In Israel, he skated on a line with former NHLer Brian Wilks and Jamin Kerner, who plays for Harvard. Ironically, his roommate in Metulla was Henrich, a natural fit since the two were the youngest players on the team.

Led by a handful of pros, junior A and college players, Canada steamrollered its opposition and won the gold medal easily. Pecker, who had attended Hebrew Foundation school in Montreal, loved the Maccabiah Games. "It was pretty good hockey, but the experience was unbelievable," he said.

Unfortunately, the rest of the year proved to be a major disappointment. About 20 games into his rookie junior season, Pecker was hospitalized with what doctors thought was appendicitis. He underwent emergency surgery and the appendix was removed, but he didn't get better. Doctors later realized he was suffering from Crohn's disease, which affects the intestinal tract. After a week in hospital, he was flown to Montreal in an air ambulance and he underwent more surgery during which doctors removed a small part of his intestine. He's now on a maintenance drug to keep the problem under control.

Pecker returned for the last 10 games of last season but the season was a write-off.

Over the summer he resolved to bounce back better than ever. He attended a number of hockey schools and he spent hours on the ice working on his skating.

Cory Pecker

So far this season, it's showed. During a recent televised game against Kitchener, Pecker blew by a Ranger defenceman who had a three-stride head start, took away an icing call and centered the puck to set up a goal. Skating speed, which was one of his weaknesses, has become a strong point.

In 26 games this year, the six-foot, 185-lb Pecker has 11 goals and 15 assists and he leads his team in plus/minus with +17.

Greyhound's head coach Dave Cameron calls Pecker "a gifted player. His offence and his ability to score goals come naturally to him. He's worked hard to improve his defensive responsibilities.

"Cory adds speed, he adds character to our team. He's a solid player who plays in all situations.

"I think Cory has a real future in hockey if he continues to work as hard as he has in the last few years," Cameron said.

Pecker is optimistic he'll be drafted by the NHL this summer. Preliminary Central Scouting evaluations have him ranked as a third rounder, but with continued strides, who knows, perhaps he'll join Henrich as a Jewish role model drafted in the first round by the NHL.

Rivo, who studied at the University of Toronto before marrying and moving to the United States, drew the sketch during a double header she attended in July 1973.

Rivo's work is part of major corporate, museum and private collections. A reproduction of Yankee Stadium 1973 is in view at Mickey Mantle's Restaurant in New York as well as in Yankee Stadium's administrative offices.

The Inside Back

The whims of justice

By JONATHAN SHIFF

Some people are of the opinion that a judge's job is to do justice, even if the law is bent in the process. Others argue that the judge is required to apply the law, regardless of the "justice" of the consequences. The following case illustrates the fact that in some instances, judges use the law as an empty vessel into which they pour contents which seem just to them.

The case, Kowarsky v. Kowarsky, was heard in the family court in Tel Aviv.

The facts involved a man who, after remarrying, gave his apartment to his daughter from his first marriage. Although the property was registered in his daughter's name, the man and his second wife continue to live in it rent-free. After his death, the widow remained in the apartment, and the daughter sued to have her evicted.

Although the widow owned an apartment in Haifa, which she rented out, she argued that she had a right to remain in the Tel Aviv dwelling, and that she needed the income from her apartment in order to live. The daughter argued that the apartment was hers, and that since the widow had an alternative, she did not have any right to stay in the apartment.

The judge surveyed the relevant statutes and case law. The laws regarding inheritance and personal status do grant a widow a limited right to continue living in the common dwelling, but do not grant her the unlimited right she was requesting. He therefore turned to a branch of law Israel inherited from the British, that of a licence to use property.

The law recognizes that the owner of a property may grant another the right to use the property without payment. In this case, the judge ruled that when the daughter received the apartment from her father, they agreed he could remain in the apartment for free for the rest of his life. The judge further inferred that the daughter also agreed the widow could remain in the apartment, and that this licence could not be canceled.

Clearly, this is a problematic ruling. First of all, the judge wrote that by her behavior, the daughter agreed to extend the licence to her father's widow, this despite the fact that the daughter sued to have the widow evicted – behavior which suggests she did not agree to such a licence.

Furthermore, despite the absence of a written agreement or statutory basis, the judge essentially stripped the daughter of all her rights for as long as her father's wife remains alive, to an apartment which is registered in her name.

From this case it is obvious that the legal construction of a "licence for use" can be a fairly empty term. In a 1969 case the Supreme Court ruled that "a licence which is unlimited in time cannot be terminated by the grantor when justice requires its existence" (emphasis added). In other words, the court can decide that a licence was given, and that justice requires it not be ended.

Nowhere is this "justice" defined, and while there are definitely cases where injustices are obvious, each judge is left to decide what justice is, and how it is to be applied. There is something very problematic in leaving one's property rights dependent on the vagaries and whims of an undefined sense of justice.

Certainly, one can debate whether justice required that the widow in this case remain in the apartment. On the one hand, it seems the judge did not want to deprive the woman of her dwelling. On the other hand, one may ask why the obligation to support her (i.e. fully subsidize her rent) should fall entirely on her late husband's daughter, especially when the woman owned property herself.

One thing is definite: It is hard to shake the notion that the law essentially gives the judge the right to, as the old joke goes, shoot the arrow and then paint the target around it. The question is whether that is a good thing or not.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I recently heard that one of my colleagues, Sandra, was looking for a new new job after 12 years of working in our office. I know this because my husband is friends with the person she applied to.

When I found out, I was so angry Sandra would do this without telling me, as we have become close over the years and our positions are directly intertwined. With her leaving it would add a ton of work to my job.

I was so upset, I confided the whole situation to another colleague, Andrea, who promised me she wouldn't tell anyone if I told her this plan of Sandra's.

Not only did Andrea tell one person, she told a few people, and it got back to Sandra, who figured out where the rumor began. Needless to say she was furious as she was questioned by our boss.

I am so hurt with Andrea I am beside myself. I can't even look her in the face. How am I going to be able to go to work now and have to face both Andrea and Sandra everyday?

Confidence Betrayed

Dear Confidence Betrayed,

Rumors have been known to destroy lives and should not be taken lightly.

What you did is called "gossip." You heard something juicy about a so called friend and colleague and revealed what was obviously supposed to be a secret to other co-workers.

Unfortunately, there is not a lot you can do at this point. The damage is done and can't be taken back. You owe Sandra an apology and hope she doesn't lose her job. As far as Andrea goes, she did nothing that you didn't do and that is spread gossip.

Often the workplace may become a little boring, so adding a little spice to your day helps get you through it. Unfortunately, you didn't think this through to realize that it could snowball and hurt someone you've been friends with for 12 years, not to mention make you look rather petty.

As far as Andrea goes, unless you plan to leave your job, make peace. In the future think before you speak; you can save yourself and others a whole lot of heartache.

JERUSALEM — As The CJN went to press on Monday, the dissolution of the Knesset was virtually assured. Prior to the debate, the Likud caucus had decided to support the dissolution bill that was submitted by MKs Haim Ramon, Ra'anan Cohen (Labor) and Haim Oron (Meretz).

The vote on Monday culminated a period of severe political agitation in the wake of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's signing of the Wye accord two months ago. Last Friday, the prime minister decided to halt the implementation of the Wye agreement.

During its weekly session on Sunday, the Cabinet adopted his policy and voted to suspend the Wye agreement until it feels the Palestinian Authority has lived up to its part of the accord.

Reaffirming the stance adopted by Netanyahu earlier this month, the Cabinet called on the Palestinian Authority to take the following steps before Israel would move forward on implementation of the Wye accord:

• cancel plans to declare an independent state unilaterally next May 4;

Co-operative mine action launched

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada and Israel have launched a co-operative mine action project in Guatemala which will focus on community rehabilitation for mine victims, Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray announced last week.

The International Centre for the Advancement of Community Rehabilitation at Queen's University in Kingston, supported by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), will be the Canadian partner. The Development Study Centre of Rehovot, Israel, affiliated with MASHAV, the Centre for International Cooperation, a development agency of Israel's foreign ministry, has been selected as the Israeli partner.

Gray made the announcement at a Chanukah reception held by Israel's Ambassador to Canada, David Sultan and his wife Adina, on behalf of Minister of Foreign Affairs Lloyd Axworthy, who had been scheduled to speak but had been detained due to the U.S. invasion of Iraq that day.

Canada's Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, left, and Israel's Ambassador to Canada David Sultan announce the joint Canada-Israel project for landmine victim rehabilitation in Guatemala.

Axworthy, who arrived before the reception ended, said the landmine action project "is a very symbolic way of celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary. I am glad we were able to work out a partnership, because it was all about saving lives, the best way of giving meaning to the values that the State of Israel was founded on. We are putting these values into practice in Guatemala."

Gray said that "the celebration is especially significant this year, as Israel continues to mark its 50th anniversary."

Three Jewish youngsters among winners in annual song writing contest

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Jewish youngsters were among the winners of the twelfth annual Christmas Carol and Chanukah Song Writing Competition sponsored by the Amadeus Choir.

Cassandra Luftspring and Aaron Schwebel, both 10, won in the Child 14 and under, Chanukah, Unison, Accompanied category; while Laura Silberberg, 12, won in the category Child 14 and under, Chanukah, Harmony, Accompanied.

Their winning entries were performed by the Amadeus Choir at its Celebrate With Brass concert, held earlier this month at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

Cassandra, a fifth grader at Bayview Fairways Public School, studies piano, composition and voice at the Yamaha Music School. She also takes jazz and tap, and has been involved in musical theatre. This summer, she received a scholarship to the National Music Camp, and performed at the Israel at 50 pavilion's Centre Spotlight Show at the CNE.

She wrote the text for the song Celebration.

Aaron has played violin since the age of seven, and now also studies voice. A Grade 5 student at Bialik Hebrew Day School, he performs in the A Cappella choir of the Toronto Children's Chorus. His winning entry, Shir Shel Chanukah (A Song for Chanukah), is his first composition.

Laura, who set the words of the traditional Chanukah prayer Al Hanisim (referred to as Ul Haneeseem in the program) to music, has won twice before. A Grade 7 student at the Claude Watson School for the Arts in North York, where she studies voice, violin and drums, she is active in competitive jazz, tap, and acrodance for the TNT Dance Studio.

Among her other achievements, she won the 1998 William R. Cockburn Memorial Scholarship for organ at the Kiwanis Music Festival, and was selected to perform in the Showcase of the Stars for the York Region Music Festival.

The Amadeus Choir, now in its 24th season, consists of 120 members, under the musical direction of Lydia Adams. It is the choir in residence of the George Weston Recital Hall, and has appeared with, among others, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the Toronto Chamber Choir.

In an effort to encourage initiative and dedication by composers of different ages, the choir sponsors the annual Christmas Carol and Chanukah Song Writing Competition. It draws entries from composers around the world.

Chanukiyah dedicated at Ottawa's new JCC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Hundreds of people gathered in the lobby of the new Soloway Jewish Community Centre for the lighting of the first Chanukah candle, following an afternoon of entertainment, children's activities and refreshments.

This was not just the first time a chanukiyah was lit in the new facility. It was also the dedication of a chanukiyah, which is, itself, historically significant.

Sabrina Goldfarb told the story of how her grandparents Saul and Edna Goldfarb had discovered the magnificent, 6-foot-high sterling silver chanukiyah on a visit to Jerusalem in 1972.

Hand-crafted from over 80 pounds of sterling silver and decorated with Eilat stone, this magnificent artifact had a fascinating history of its own.

It was the chanukiyah used to celebrate the first Chanukah at the Western Wall following Jerusalem's reunification in 1967.

The Goldfarbs purchased it with the intention of donating it to the Ottawa Jewish community, but it was too large to fit in the former JCC, and they have kept it in their own home for the past 26 years.

Finally, this year the Chanukiyah has found an appropriate home.

"Now my sister, brother, cousins and everyone can see it all the time," Sabrina Goldfarb said.

JCC president Jeff Gould told the audience that "this menorah was given as an act of community spirit and a symbol of the type of community spirit we hope it will engender in years to come."

As he lit the first candle, Saul Goldfarb, who was an opera singer, sang the brachot in his deep melodious voice. The audience joined him in singing Ma'oz Tsur and other Chanukah songs.

Schneerson as Messiah controversy resurfaces

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 5-year old controversy has again sprung up, after the publication of an ad in various newspapers, including the Jewish Tribune, affirming as a "rabbinical ruling" that Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, is the Messiah.

While a belief in the coming of the Messiah is an integral tenet of Jewish faith, a small group of Lubavitch chassidim say that He has already come, in the person of Rabbi Schneerson.

Rabbi Schneerson died in June, 1993, after 44 years at the helm of the Lubavitch movement.

The men and women who acknowledge the Rebbe as Melech HaMoshiach (King Messiah), base their belief on Rabbi Schneerson's own writings, the fact that he made many accurate prophecies (such as that Israel would not be harmed during the Gulf War), and that, according to them, he encouraged the singing of Yehi HaMelech, a song taken by them as recognizing him as the Messiah.

The group is not hesitant about publicizing their views through such means as newspaper ads, lectures, flags, signs, and publications.

Rabbi Yosaif Yarmush, Toronto director of Tzivos Hashem, the Lubavitch youth movement, is a signator of the most recent newspaper ad, which decrees that "the Rebbe Melech HaMoshiach has the halachic status of a prophet, and it is explicit in his holy sichos [writings] that he alludes to his being a prophet (and it is understood from his sichos that he is Melech HaMoshiach...) and he already predicted, before all Jews and before the entire world, things that have come to pass in their entirety...Therefore we are obligated to listen to everything we are told [by the Rebbe] as an obligation to listen to a prophet, including the fact that the Rebbe is Melech HaMoshiach and will immediately be revealed to us."

Other signatories are Rabbis Yitzchok HaCohen Hendel of Montreal, Menachem Mendel Matusof of Calgary, Yosef Yitzchok Zaltzman, rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto, and others from Israel, South America, the former Soviet Union, United States, Austria, Germany, Italy and Australia.

Rabbi Yarmush explained to The CJN that a fundamental philosophy in Jewish theology is that there is a person in every generation who could be the Messiah, if God wills that it be so. However, "if we do more mitzvot, we can hasten His coming," or, in the case of Rabbi Schneerson, hasten his universal revelation as being the Messiah.

The acceptance of Rabbi Schneerson as the Messiah is a highly controversial view in the Lubavitch community, and indeed is rejected by the majority. An ad in The CJN on Sept. 19, 1996, signed by the majority of the prominent Lubavitch rabbis in Toronto and Hamilton, objecting to an ad proclaiming Rabbi Schneerson as the Messiah which appeared in the Toronto Star the previous week, asserted that it is not endorsed by the Agudas Chassidei Chabad International, the Central Committee of Chabad Lubavitch Rabbis of United States and Canada, or the Chabad Lubavitch Institutions of Southern Ontario. In fact, the ad says, the notion is "a distortion of and contrary to the teachings, aspirations and lifelong endeavors of the Lubavitcher Rebbe OBM."

A statement earlier this year by the Central Committee of Chabad-Lubavitch Rabbis in the United States and Canada, the organizing board of the central rabbinic organization of Chabad-Lubavitch, is even stronger.

It asserts that "the preoccupation with identifying the Rebbe as Moshiach is clearly contrary to the Rebbe's wishes;" that "the deification of any human being is contrary to the core and foundation of the Jewish faith;" that "the various talmudic, midrashic and other sources which ...ascribe superhuman spiritual attributes to certain righteous people were never meant to be deification and great care must be taken when quoting them;" that "conjecture as to the possible identity of Moshiach is not part of the basic tenet of Judaism."

Asked to comment on the traditional Jewish view on the subject, Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, said: "While we daily affirm our belief in the imminent arrival of the Messiah, we discourage excessive messianic speculation.

"Mainstream rabbinic opinion rejects the notion of a resurrected messiah. Although there are minority texts which could be so interpreted, even those texts do not speak of a messianic career interrupted by death."

Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, said that Rabbi Schneerson "was without question one of the outstanding 20th-century Jewish leaders. He helped re-establish the vibrancy of Jewish life after the Holocaust, and bring closer Jews who were far removed from their heritage.

"The various ads claiming the Rebbe to be 'Moshiach' brings dishonor to his memory. A man of his stature deserves to be remembered by all Jews everywhere for the unconditional love he displayed towards all."

Rabbi Martin Berman, a member of the executive of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, called it "inappropriate for a highly controversial psak din [rabbinic ruling] to be recorded in a newspaper ad as if it were accepted by a majority of the Jewish people."

From the editor's desk

(Last month I attended the 67th General Assembly (GA) of the UJA Federations of North America. For the first time ever, it was held in Jerusalem. In the past weeks, I have used this space to reflect on some of my experiences there)

Understanding it better

On the eve of the GA, Dov Lautman, the Israel chair of the GA, gave an interview to Ha'aretz, Israel's leading daily newspaper. The very next day, the first full day of the GA, the day we arrived in Israel, the main headline in the English-language edition of Ha'aretz was "Israeli UJA chief tells U.S. Jews: 'Keep your money at home.'"

The headline was as incongruous as it was shocking. At the largest annual gathering of UJA workers, professionals and volunteers from North America, the chief Israeli GA "pointman" was telling them, in effect, Israel can get by without their efforts!

Despite his business acumen and his entrepreneurial success, Lautman totally misconceived the incomparable uniqueness of the UJA's Israel mandate. He totally failed to grasp what lies at the very heart of making a donation to UJA. He simply did not understand that the macro-statistics of Diaspora-Israel philanthropy are really about the countless, micro-connections between individual human beings.

When one follows the trail of the UJA gift through its bureaucratic echelons, the large "categories" – Israel, Diaspora, regions, communities, projects – eventually all fall away, subdividing into smaller and smaller units until what remains are the irreducible, needy, single, human beings in Israel whose lives are made better, perhaps healthier, happier, by the poignant generosity of single human beings in other parts of the Jewish world, Canada, for example.

Every UJA Federation in North America is an instrument for the poignant generosity of single human beings.

In Israel, I joined a group of GA delegates from Toronto to see some of the specific micro-results of our UJA Federation's donations.

PROJECT RENEWAL TORONTO CANADA

Over the years, the UJA Federation of Toronto has been involved in a number of "projects" in a number of "communities." Our group visited two communities: Kfar Gvirol and Eilat.

Kfar Gvirol is a large neighborhood, a suburb of sorts, just southwest of Rehovot. It was founded in 1948 by immigrants from Yemen and Iraq. They were joined by immigrants from Morocco.

Kfar Gvirol was always poor and always deprived. It soon developed a "reputation" and with it, the stigma that robs residents of the possibility of self-improvement.

In 1983, the Jews of Toronto became involved with the Jews of Kfar Gvirol. A state-of-the-art day-care centre eventually was built. That was followed by Toronto Jewish Community Campus in Kfar Gvirol comprising both a community centre and an elementary school.

Today, some 900 families live there, and in the words of Gabi Golan, chair of the neighborhood committee, Kfar Gvirol "has succeeded in completely changing its image, and instead of being a place from which everyone tried to escape, it became one of the most attractive neighborhoods in the area due to its educational buildings, community services and mainly, the quality of life the neighborhood could offer its residents."

Eilat is Israel's southernmost city. Far-removed from Israel's centre, it is isolated by distance and geography from the rest of the country.

For many years, Eilat's location was its disadvantage, attracting few new residents, and keeping even fewer. Its people were poor. Parents could only dream of their children choosing to remain through adulthood in their city.

Today, some 33,000 people live in Eilat. Ten years ago, there were approximately 21,000. The city is growing.

Helping the city grow and develop and helping those many parents live to see their dreams come true are the Jews of Toronto, whose donations to the UJA have helped to make Eilat a more attractive, more successful, more viable place to live. The Jews of Toronto have actually built a library and two special learning kindergartens in Eilat.

Seeing the human beings and not merely the slogans, I understood better what UJA actually means "on the ground." If only Lautman understood it better, too.

Whitby business vandalized

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

WHITBY — A Jewish merchant here was shocked to find a swastika and other graffiti scrawled on his business last week.

Mark Lichtental, owner of Baby Shack, which sells furniture for babies and toddlers, discovered the daubings when he opened his Brock St. shop last Wednesday morning.

"I was really upset and emotional," a visibly shaken Lichtental, 49, told The CJN. "I'm an ordinary Canadian. I deal with pregnant women."

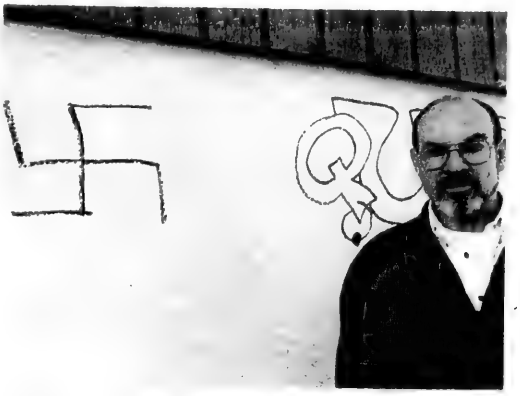
The graffiti were sprayed with black paint on the rear of the shop. The markings included a cross with a satanic message, the stylized word "Quads," and a swastika.

"Where does someone get these ideas?" Lichtental wondered.

No other merchants on the shop-filled street in Whitby, about 40 minutes east of Toronto, were hit.

Lichtental, who has run the shop with his wife Beth for 15 years, wonders why he was singled out.

"We don't hide [the fact] that we're Jewish. But we don't advertise it either."



Whitby merchant Mark Lichtental stands before his vandalized store.

Lichtental said that a few years ago, he was involved in a dispute with a neighboring business over a laneway. He said staff at the other shop would often hurl anti-Semitic insults and taunts his way.

Last year, two members of a neo-Nazi group were convicted for passing out hate-filled literature in the area.

Lichtental was born in Poland after World War II and was brought to Israel as an infant. He said this incident is especially painful for him because his father was a Holocaust survivor, while his late mother's Catholic family helped hide Jews during the war. Yad Vashem has recognized his mother as a Righteous Gentile.

Durham Region police are investigating the incident.

Perl's Meats fined $10,000

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Perl's Meat Products Ltd. pleaded guilty in Provincial Court in Toronto earlier this month to two counts of violating the Food and Drugs Act by adding sulphurous acid to meat labelled as "Ground Beef Extra Lean."

The company was fined $10,000 and given 90 days to pay.

Sulphurous acid, a mixture of sulphur dioxide and water, keeps the product looking red and appealingly fresh.

Herman Perl, owner of Perl's, told The CJN that an employee, who has since been fired, added the chemical to a small amount of meat at the beginning of the summer without his knowledge or approval.

He said that he pleaded guilty because, as the business owner, he had ultimate responsibility. Explaining that the sulphurous acid was used to clean tables, he said that there is no longer any on the premises, so the offence cannot be repeated.

Recent laboratory reports have shown Perl's meat to be completely free of the substance, Perl said.

Joe Di Lecce, an inspector and spokesperson for the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, said that the sulphurous acid was found during one of the regular inspections of the establishment. "We test all places that sell meat for things like sulphurous acid, as well as, for example, making sure that the fat content agrees with what is on the label, and that packages contain only the kind of meat that they are supposed to."

Di Lecce explained that sulphurous acid is an allergen, and people who are particularly sensitive to sulphites, or allergic to them, can become ill, even with very low levels. There can be such serious results as anaphylactic shock or the blocking of the airway for those with asthma.

This is the first time Perl's has been found to have used the chemical, Di Lecci said.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, said that the sulphurous acid would not affect the kashrut of the meat.

JF&CS adopts suggestions to help Jewish homeless

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has taken more concrete and immediate steps toward dealing with homeless Jews.

Following a meeting last week, the agency's newly struck homeless task force made four specific recommendations:

- sensitizing the agency's intake and after-hours emergency staff to the homeless problem, and providing them with a list of available resources;
- establishing accounts with budget hotels for emergency placements. (this was scheduled to be accomplished by last Friday);
- Continuing to work toward establishing a coordinated information network on services available in the community;
- and contacting rabbis to make them aware of JF&CS's services for the Jewish homeless.

As well, the agency has hired a worker to assemble all relevant information on resources for the homeless in and around Toronto, a task expected to take about a week.

JF&CS has also adopted most of the recommendations made by freelance social worker Lillian Freedman, who spent October and November on the streets of Toronto searching for homeless Jews as a pilot project.

JF&CS paid Freedman $2,500 for her efforts. She had the agency's authority – and a continuous float of $200 – to locate homeless Jews. She found five on the streets. Three of those were found permanent accommodations, but one of them, a woman in her 50s, returned to the streets.

A 66-year-old Russian- and Yiddish-speaking woman, described as emotionally unstable, still lives in a park in the Bathurst-Antibes area.

Freedman says she incurred large personal expenses on her mission, for which she was not reimbursed. She says her cell phone bill is approaching $1,600. "Had I been aware of the constant flood of calls, day and night, from these five people, their relatives and interested citizens, and the strong response that would come from the community, I would have asked for a separate cell phone for two months, and not used my own," Freedman writes in her report to the task force.

In any event, JF&CS, in its report, says that in the past six months, it has helped 27 Jewish homeless who have been living in shelters, cars, and with friends "but had no independent accommodations."

These 27 were accommodated "in appropriate housing." As well, 10 different clients were moved into subsidized housing. Eight other clients were given emergency funds to avoid eviction.

The total cost was about $20,000, paid from JF&CS's Financial Assistance Program, which tops up welfare payments, and its Rent Advance Fund, which pays first and last months' rents on apartments. Some of that money was repaid over time by deductions from the client's ongoing financial assistance from the agency.

The JF&CS task force declined two of Freedman's recommendations: setting up a crisis hot line, and developing a team of volunteers who would go downtown to search for homeless Jews.

JF&CS director Gordon Wolfe told The CJN that dispatching volunteers to go looking for Jewish homeless poses legal risks for the agency. And the number of homeless Jews located so far by Freedman does not justify a telephone hot line, he added.

Besides, he said, homeless Jews tend not to fit stereotypes about the homeless generally.

"They're not wandering the streets of downtown Toronto. They're people who have been evicted or are threatened with eviction, or they're staying with friends temporarily. They have no housing, but they're not necessarily out on the streets."

When all this started in the fall, there was friction between Freedman, who envisioned a whole new, crisis-oriented approach to the problem, and JF&CS, which believed that the needs of the Jewish homeless could be folded into existing services.

Freedman described current efforts as "very good. Consciousness has been raised about what it's like to live on the streets."

The homeless task force meets again in mid-February.

CD-ROM celebrates Israel's 50th

TORONTO — State of Israel Bonds has released a CD-ROM as a conclusion to its Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations.

The Israel at 50 Special Edition CD-ROM was the product of an eight-month development project, and was produced with the cooperation of Toronto's Israel at Fifty consortium.

"This is undoubtedly one of the most ambitious projects ever undertaken by our organization," said Lawrence Waller, executive vice-president of Israel Bonds. "We are very excited to embrace this new technology as a means of reaching a new audience."

The CD-ROM has four major components: There are multi-media presentations on various aspects of Israel's history and culture; an Israel Bonds Daily Journal, which allows users to find facts from Israel's history that correspond to a particular date; a screen saver that provides Hebrew-English translations and facts about other communal organizations; and interactive games with an opportunity to win a trip for two to Israel. The CD also features remarks by Jehudi Kinar, Israel's consul-general in Toronto.

The CD-ROM is being mailed to over 15,000 individuals across Canada. In addition, it will be provided to over 3,000 Jewish day school students in the Toronto area.

Instrumental in developing the CD-ROM was Ron Bernbaum, an active Israel Bonds volunteer.

"The CD-ROM would have remained nothing more than another good idea if it weren't for Ron's vision, expertise and commitment," said David Brown, chair of the Ontario region for Israel Bonds. "As a result of his tireless efforts, Israel Bonds is one of the first communal organizations in Canada to have a CD-ROM to its credit."

A recent preview of the CD-ROM for Toronto area Jewish day school educators brought rave reviews. More than one of those present noted that it was exactly the kind of technology-based Israel related resource that schools needed.

The CD-ROM was created in the studios of New Media Architects, a Toronto based multi-media and software development firm.

Former mayor Hall delivers Lenkinski lecture

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Human rights contribute as much to healthy communities as schools, roads and fire departments, former Toronto mayor Barbara Hall said recently.

That is why they must be cherished and supported by local governments if they are to be real rights for real people, she said in presenting the third annual Louis Lenkinski Memorial Lecture on Human Rights in the Lipa Green building.

Now chair of National Strategy on Community Safety and Crime Prevention, Hall said she sees the same issues emerging on the local scene – the perils of homelessness, abuse of women and exploitation of immigrant labor, among others.

On all these fronts, she paid tribute to Louis Lenkinski, the trade union leader whose wife, Helen, and son Lionel, were in the audience.

Human rights abuses in Kosovo, Indonesia and China should not be used as an excuse "to evade the much more troubling issues taking place here in our own backyards," Hall said.

As a former member of city council, she spoke of her own attempts to build a healthy city, and referred with approval to the Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations.

"Its work helps to ensure that citizens, irrespective of gender, sexual orientation, religion, disability or ethnic origin, can participate fully in the life of the city. Just one example of the committee's advocacy is a recently initiated complaint against Ernst Zundel for spreading hate on the internet."

Hall said she agreed with urban planner Jane Jacobs that cities have an obligation to make streets and neighborhoods safe for people who have different lifestyles, but want to live next door to each other in an urban setting.

In introducing Hall, lecture chair Rabbi Jordan Pearlson said Lenkinski and others like Hall were instrumental in transforming Toronto from "one of the most bigoted cities" in the world into "the realm of one of the most peaceful, productive and sensitive multicultural communities in the world."

Rabbi Pearlson said Hall helped to make Toronto City Hall a place "where human rights and individual rights were respected and not confronted."

The meeting was sponsored by Congress on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights.

A closing inventory

This is the last issue of The CJN in 1998. It may be appropriate, therefore, to "take inventory" of some of the main news stories that comprise the multi-mirrored corridor through which this calendar year, reflecting the evolution of our civilization to date, is now passing in the annual transformation of one year into the next. The list is not comprehensive. There could have been many more entries. They derive from the past weekend's perusal of the newspapers. But lest anyone confuse our purpose, we do not wish to dishearten. Rather we wish to inspire. It is to recommit to our values, to refocus on our responsibilities and to rededicate our efforts for the coming year that we record this list.

In Canada

• Quebec. The government of Quebec is still, officially, bent on separating Quebec from Canada, although the majority of the people of Quebec, officially, do not want to be taken out of Canada. In his ongoing effort to reduce that majority, Quebec's Premier Lucien Bouchard told visiting French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin that one of Canada's ambitions "over the last 30 years [has been] to drown Quebec's identity..." In light of the fact that Canada's prime minister himself and more than a third of the federal cabinet are Quebecers, the premier's statement never reaches higher than mere pettiness.

• Poverty. A public discussion has begun to try to redefine the poverty line. The debate encompasses two possible methods for determining poverty: the low income cutoff (LICO) method or the market basket measure (MBM) method. Using the former method, some 17 percent of Canadians are said to be living in poverty; using the latter method, the number falls to 12 percent. The MBM method is undoubtedly good news for those five percent of Canadians who, by the switch of a definition, will no longer be "poor."

In Israel

• The Peace process. Wherefore Wye? That is now the question Israelis and Palestinians are asking each other. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced last week he would not proceed with the next troop redeployment scheduled for last Friday, as agreed under the Wye accords. He would only redeploy after the Palestinians had honored their agreed-to commitments, such as to confiscate illegal weapons, stop anti-Israel incitement, curb violence, reduce the size of the Palestinian police force and renounce any intention to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state. Polls have consistently shown that the majority of both Israelis and Palestinians want the peace process to advance, but their leaders seem somehow incapable of doing this.

• Political uncertainty. As of this writing, the outcome of Monday's vote of no-confidence is not known. Pollsters, pundits and political experts in Israel of every stripe have already decided that the government of Benjamin Netanyahu will assuredly fall and that elections will be held by April 1999. As history has taught us, the holding of elections in April is no guarantee that there will be a new government even by June. What will be the effect on the peace process, the economy and the social fabric of the country of so prolonged a period of political uncertainty?

Further abroad

• In the United States, partisanship has gone berserk. The impeachment of President Bill Clinton has reduced the American political system to a level of derision, mockery and ridicule unprecedented in modern times. Civility was defeated by partisanship.

• In the former Soviet Union, the jingoistic, nationalistic communist/fascists are going berserk. They are bringing out of its temporary cold storage, that old, reliable footstool, anti-Semitism on which to stand and from which which to spout their reinvigorated hatreds.

Happy new year.

Objects to using Holocaust as a metaphor

Re: The Washington conference on Holocaust assets. (CJN, Dec. 3)

I find it unusual and disturbing that we get this report post facto, that we, the survivors had no input.

It appears that millions will be collected for distribution among the still living Holocaust survivors. The article makes it clear that the money will be held in escrow and it will take at least a year before they will decide who will get it. The fact that many of these survivors may not live that long, that at present they may need badly those few dollars for food and medication does not seem to bother anyone. It is indeed ironic that very strong presentations were made to Germany and the Swiss Banks on behalf of Holocaust survivors, who in turn, are lost in the shuffle. I believe that if funds are collected in the name and on behalf of Holocaust survivors, it is their money and it should not be used for educational or other purposes.

We the survivors, and not you, were in those camps and forests. We lost our loved ones, we suffered and suffer daily from the effects and memories of those years. So, by what right did you decide that it is "inappropriate to end the 20th century arguing over how to divvy up the assets." Are these your assets? Your pension fund or some other investment? No, by your own admission, these sums were, are, and will be collected for the Holocaust survivors, period, without any right of selection as to who does, and who does not get it. All Holocaust survivors deserve their share equally.

Dr. Irving Abella stated in the article that it was decided at the London conference that "it would be inappropriate to end the 20th century arguing over how to divvy up assets." And he further stated: "So (in Washington), we'll be stressing Holocaust education using the Holocaust as a metaphor."

Here are two issues: Who authorized any of these members to decide that it is "inappropriate" to argue about the assets? If so, why did they go on the warpath to get the money?

The second, most painful issue is the use of the world "metaphor."

Who are the educators or other authorities who demoted the Holocaust to a metaphor? Six million martyrs became a metaphor? The survivors of KZs, Auschwitz, Belsen, and some of the rarely mentioned KZ Lagers like Ebensee, Mauthausen, Gusen, Gross Rosen, Flossenburg and Natzweiler are "metaphors?" Did we become a figure of speech by the grace of a committee? What exactly did Abella and his colleagues mean by "using the Holocaust as a metaphor?"

From the scholar who co-authored None is Too Many, using the Holocaust as a metaphor is a frightening change. It indicates the trivialization of the Holocaust. I have this strange feeling that we, the handful of survivors, are given a lot of lip service but in reality we are regarded as an unwanted minority, holding up progress and interfering with business. Otherwise a hand-picked, highly qualified interdisciplinary team would not have labeled the martyrdom of six million Jews, and the physical and psychological suffering of the survivors as metaphorical.

No de-emphasis of supplementary education intended

Your article entitled "Rabbi Questions the Value of Supplementary Hebrew School" (CJN, Nov. 19) reports on a panel discussion which I moderated at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. The occasion was the launch of the book, Creating the Jewish Future edited by Michael Brown and Bernard Lightman, a book which originated in a conference by the same name held two years ago at the York University Centre for Jewish Studies.

I see no basis for the claim made in the article and in the headline that Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said that supplementary school education should be de-emphasized. Like the other panel members, he said clearly that many different educational, social and religious approaches will be necessary if we wish to create a vibrant Jewish future.

Objects to tone of story about her award

I would like to correct some misinformation that your newspaper published about my "Concert Artist Award" win from the American Harp Society. (CJN, Aug. 13)

The tone of the article as it is written, portrayed me as cavalier and rebellious, critical with regard to the classical world, classical harpists, the American Harp Society (AHS) and its members.

The American Harp Society is comprised of many types of people. In addition to classical harpists, members of the AHS include: jazz, pop, and folk harpists, non-professional harpists, professional harpists, students, and even non-harpists. For the record, the audience on the day of my audition was comprised of a mixture of these types of people, not just classical harpists as the article implies.

Although I feel that I would like to break new ground in my approach to playing the harp, I certainly do not feel the need to put other people down, especially classical harpists, a group that I am part of and admire.

Hidden Treasures: 100 years mining Cairo Genizah

By VICTOR BOCHMAN

The high reverence for God's name, which is a characteristic of Judaism, is one of the main reasons explaining Jewish esteem for the written word. It was unthinkable for Jews to destroy a Jewish manuscript since in each manuscript God's name would have been written many times.

But what should be done with unnecessary or damaged documents, books and scrolls, as well as with texts declared by the rabbis as pernicious or contradictory to the dogmas of Judaism? Such materials were often buried in cemeteries, and some Jewish communities have maintained this custom to this day. However, the principal way to keep unwanted, defective or "heretical" manuscripts as well as out-of-date documents was to place them in special chambers or niches in the synagogue's attics. Such a chamber was called a genizah (literally: hiding place), derived from the Hebrew root gnz – hence the word lignoz – to conceal).

Solomon Schechter

Every ancient or medieval synagogue had its own genizah. As the genizah filled up, it was sealed forever, or so it would seem. But in the 19th century, some synagogues in Middle Eastern cities were repaired or even destroyed, which provided an opportunity for opening the genizahs, thus allowing the materials to pass into the hands of collectors and scholars. It appeared that many unique texts of various contents had been kept – ancient and medieval Hebrew theological and scientific treaties, literary works, and a mass of other interesting documents.

The largest genizah so far discovered is that of the Ezra Synagogue in Cairo, commonly named the Cairo Genizah, which was discovered just over 100 years ago, in 1896. The importance of this discovery can be likened to that of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, since the significance of genizah material for medieval Jewish history may be compared with that of the Scrolls for the history of early Christianity.

The immense amount of Cairo Genizah materials and the extreme variety of the contents are easily explained. For many centuries, Cairo played an important role as one of the most prominent Middle Eastern economic, political and cultural centres; the Cairo Jewish community consequently held a leading position among other Jewish communities, not only in Egypt, itself one of the oldest lands of the Jewish Diaspora, but in the Middle East in general.

Soon after the Arab conquest of Egypt, in the late seventh century, the newly built city of Fostat became the administrative centre of Egypt and remained so until the adjacent city of Cairo was built in the 10th century. In 882, Jews of Fostat bought a destroyed building, formerly the Coptic church of St. Michael, repaired it and reopened it as a synagogue, which they called the Ezra Synagogue.

For many centuries, the genizah of the Ezra Synagogue slowly filled up with material. About 1,000 years later, information concerning the genizah began to reach Europe. Early evidence attesting to its existence, such as that of the 18th century poet Simon von Heldern, did not attract the attention of scholars at that time.

Thus, practically speaking, two collectors – Jacob Saphir (1832-1886) and Abraham Firkovich (1787-1874) – may be considered the discoverers of the genizah. Both of them visited it as early as 1864, but were not able to estimate its importance. Saphir, a bookseller, was interested in manuscripts in good condition, which could be profitably sold. But the genizah comprised mostly fragments, and in the prevailing conditions, even high-quality paper or parchment leaves were undergoing a constant process of decay as a result of the humidity, mud, dust, rodents and insects… Consequently, Saphir was in the Ezra Synagogue for a very short time and took away with him only a few leaves.

Abraham Firkovich was a Russian Karaite, already well known by that time among scholars as a traveller and collector, who had sold a large collection of Hebrew manuscripts to the Imperial Public Library in St. Petersburg. He was interested in every kind of material relating to Jewish history… whether it was a complete text or a fragment, well preserved or damaged. He had examined fragments at another Cairo Karaite synagogue, in May-June and in September 1864.

After he had finished his work there, he came to the Ezra Synagogue intending to study its genizah… He removed some materials from the Ezra Synagogue and took them with him to Russia. After his death, these fragments, together with manuscripts from the Karaite Genizah and others, were purchased by the Russian Imperial Public Library…

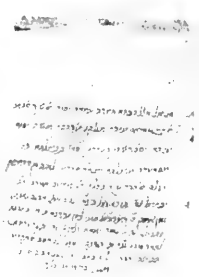
Additional materials from the genizah were received by European libraries and private collectors in the early 1890s. The repair of the Ezra Synagogue undertaken in 1890 by leaders of the Cairo Jewish community caused the occasional opening of the genizah, and in a short time a number of collectors appeared who took away some parts of its treasures…

But the main part of the Cairo Genizah materials are to be found in the Cambridge University Library, which has over 140,000 of the total 250,000 fragments. The library received such valuable materials by a stroke of luck.

In 1896, two English ladies, Agnes Smith Lewis and Margaret Dunlop Gibson, while travelling in Egypt, acquired some fragments from the Cairo Genizah. On returning to England in spring 1896, the ladies showed the fragments to Prof. Solomon Schechter of Cambridge University for identification. Schechter, who played a key role in the acquisition of the genizah materials as well as in genizah studies [was recognized as a linguist and] as an expert in Semitic studies.

May 13, 1896, the day when the two ladies showed Schechter their genizah fragments, became a noteworthy day in the history of Jewish studies. Among the fragments shown to Schechter was an ancient leaf that caused a real sensation. Schechter identified it as a fragment of the The Book of Wisdom ascribed to Ben Sira, a second-century BCE Jewish sage. The Book of Wisdom became a part of the Christian biblical canon when translated into Greek. But the Hebrew original text was considered lost, and many scholars even doubted its existence. Schechter's discovery immediately attracted the attention of his colleagues, and then other fragments were tracked down in the Bodleian Library, the British Museum and others. All the fragments found had a common source – the Cairo Genizah.

With the hope of locating additional parts of the original Ben Sira text, Schechter decided to journey to Cairo… In December 1896, Schechter left for Cairo. He carried with him letters of recommendation from the Chief Rabbi of Great Britain, Dr. Herman Adler, to the Chief Rabbi of Cairo, Aharon Ben Shimon, and from the vice-chancellor of Cambridge University to the president of the Cairo Jewish community, Joseph Kattawi, which were intended to procure access to the genizah.



A letter from Maimonides found in the Genizah.

The genizah itself was located in a narrow chamber without doors and windows, at the end of the synagogue gallery. The only way into it led through a large hole in the wall, and it was necessary to use a ladder in order to gain access. The chamber was full of fragments that emitted clouds of dust at every touch, and naturally, was totally in the dark. It was in such conditions that Schechter had to work.

However, due to his great erudition and enthusiasm, he was able to classify the contents of the fragments while still in Cairo. The leaders of the Jewish community agreed to hand the genizah materials over to the Cambridge University Library, and in spring 1896, Schechter brought back to Cambridge with him 104 boxes crammed with ancient manuscripts.

The main problem was to identify the [documents]. Even complete medieval manuscripts rarely contained a title-page; and much of the material was in the form of individual leaves or even fragments of a leaf. It was no great problem to identify biblical and talmudic fragments as well as parts of prayer books, but the genizah demonstrated great diversity of contents, and thus its study called for wide erudition. For instance, it was not enough to have knowledge of Hebrew to identify the fragments of Ben Sira's Book of Wisdom, since no Hebrew text of this work had been known before Schechter's discovery. Schechter compared the unknown Hebrew text with old Christian translations of the work in Greek, Latin and Syriac. In 1899, Schechter and Taylor published the entire text of the Book of Wisdom, piecing together all the fragments.

From the first appearance of the genizah materials in Europe, scholars began to pay serious attention to them.

First of all, the large numbers of medieval official and private documents (mostly from Middle Eastern Jewish communities) should be noted… Before the discovery of the Cairo Genizah, no library had possessed such documents. The discovery provided scholars with thousands of documents community minutes, rabbinical court records, title-deeds, leases and endowment documents, debt acknowledgments, marriage contracts (ketubot) and private letters. Most of the documents date to the 10th-13th centuries – a period poorly represented in Jewish narrative sources…

An important body of documents was found relating to the history of the Jews in Palestine at the time and their relations to the Crusaders. The genizah materials dramatically demonstrated the great role played by the Jews in the economic and cultural life of the medieval Middle East, and provided significant evidence of the prevailing good relations between Jews and Arabs…

The genizah documents give a detailed picture of the economic and cultural life of the Middle Eastern and Mediterranean region over many centuries. This aspect of genizah studies was one of the principal trends carried out over several decades by the prominent scholar Shlomo Dov Goitein (1900-1985)… His principal work, based on the genizah documents, was an immense monograph in five volumes, The Mediterranean Society, describing social, economic, political and cultural aspects of Mediterranean Jewish communities in the 10th-13th centuries.

In 1962, an American medievalist, Prof. Norman Golb, was studying an ancient letter preserved under glass at the Cambridge University. He was especially interested in some strange names among the signatures which were neither in Hebrew nor Arabic. The text itself was damaged by mud and humidity, and was difficult to read. However, an ultraviolet photograph of the letter enabled Golb to read the name of the place where the letter was written: Kiev, thus providing the oldest (10th century) evidence of the existence of a Jewish community in the Ukrainian city…

It should be emphasized that the genizah materials reflect aspects of Jewish life in many countries of the medieval world (especially in the Middle East) and that they are an irreplaceable source for knowledge of contemporary Jewish history and culture… The genizah materials are well-nigh inexhaustible, and there will be material for many generations of scholars to study in the future…

It must be remembered that the Cairo Genizah is not the only one. Valuable material is also preserved in the Karaite Genizah, mostly included in the Firkovich collection, and in some other genizahs. Moreover, new discoveries are also possible. The study of Middle Eastern genizahs by scholars of different countries will contribute to the further understanding of medieval Jewish culture.

Opinions

Act in the face of this need

When my daughter worked in an office in the downtown east side of Vancouver, I often picked her up at the end of the day. More than once, I passed a young girl selling herself at a nearby corner. She was not more than 14, with clear skin, huge dark eyes and long black hair. In short, she looked like a normal teen, except that she was prostituting herself while her pimp, no doubt, lurked in a nearby shadow.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I, broke my heart. I wanted to stop the car, gather her in and take her back to her family and people. On the other hand, what horrors was she escaping from? I did nothing.

Over the past few years since I last drove down that street, the downtown east side has become infamous for AIDS and deaths from overdoses, now nearing 400 a year. The community is ravaged by drugs, devastated by neglect, and overwhelmed by the magnitude of human misery on its streets.

Officials admit they have lost control, even though we have a needle exchange program. It is swamped by demand and unable to keep up, hence the growth of IV drug users with HIV. Since we have few detox centres, halfway houses, or maintenance programs, we flutter helplessly in the face of this human tragedy.

I cannot believe that other cities in Canada do not face the same kind of overwhelming despair on their streets. Maybe our milder climate is why many are here. But I know they are everywhere, these children of the night who sell themselves even at noon.

Several weeks ago the New York Times did a feature on the street kids of the Big Apple, and not surprisingly, most of them seem to come from New York itself and not from the heartland of the country. Again, drugs, prostitution and sickness are their lot. But the article held out hope offered by a few places, one of which I want to tell you about.

Kaplan House is a group home supported by the Jewish Board of Family and Children's Services, which in turn, is supported by the New York UIA-Federation. Kaplan House offers 25 young men counseling, tutoring and job training while they heal from the wounds of abusive homes and life on the streets. There are other such places, none able to cope with the estimated 20,000 street kids, but all making an effort. But it was Kaplan House that spoke to me, because it is supported by a Jewish Agency.

Needless to say, its clientele is, by and large, not Jewish.

So I began to think about our communities, so rich that they rival United Way in the amount raised for tzedakah at home and abroad. I thought about the millions recently pledged to send all Jewish teens to Israel in the next decade. About the thousands we spend on dinners honoring important donors. About the simchot we sponsor for our children, lucky to be born into homes where they are loved, nurtured, educated and protected from the mean streets of our own cities.

And I realized that although we say we should love our neighbour as ourselves, we don't act that way. Right now, the girl I saw years ago on the streets may be dead, lying in a drug-induced coma, or nursing wounds from her pimp or a bad trick. And I and my community did nothing to save her.

I do not want to get letters telling me that we give to United Way out of proportion to our numbers. We must do so if we are to fulfil the commandment at all. But as communities with access to great wealth, we should be going to whoever it takes, and saying – we can do something for you. We can create a safe place for at least some, and we can save lives. Why are we sitting here in the comfort of our homes while children are dying on the streets?

It does us no credit. It is a shame on us that we do not, as Jewish communities, act in the face of this need. I want our Federations to create the kind of funding that makes Kaplan House work. We can afford it, but more than that, we are commanded to do it.

I know that in our community, a caring family has supported an AIDS hospice.

In Toronto the Ve'Ahavta, Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, does its work for the homeless. These are the kinds of efforts that fulfil the commandment to love our neighbors as ourselves. Our neighbors aren't the people in the next house. They are the kids out there on street corners, dying without love or hope.

And we are failing them.

The politics of pronunciation

The National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP) recently concluded its highly successful Read Hebrew America/Read Hebrew Canada project. As part of this Hebrew literacy project, 1,124 classes were offered at 732 locations across the United States and Canada, including two classes in Edmonton. One class used Sephardi pronunciation and one Ashkenazi. I was, quite frankly, surprised that in 1998, anyone would want to learn Hebrew with an Ashkenazi pronunciation.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Speaking on behalf of the NJOP, Melanie Notkin told me that in 1988, when the project began, instructional materials were geared to Ashkenazi pronunciation but over time, they evolved such that the course now features Sephardi pronunciation. The NJOP allows each congregation or centre to teach whichever pronunciation it chooses, although teachers are encouraged to indicate to their students the differences between the two.

I should not have been surprised that students were being taught Ashkenazi pronunciation in Edmonton. Last summer, I was asked to give a d'var torah at a shevah brachot – the week-long series of parties that follow an Orthodox wedding. After discussing the upcoming Torah portion, I tried to relate the parshah to the bride and groom, or as I referred to them in Hebrew, the chatan and the kallah. The groom subtly and quietly corrected me. I should have referred to him not as the chatan but as the choson. I assume, on the same theory, that I was participating not in the shevah brachot but in the shevah brochos.

The difference between the Sephardi pronunciation and the Ashkenazi seems, on the surface at least, minor. However, something of greater significance is going on here.

When I was a child in Sydney, N.S., Rabbi and Mrs. Israel Kenner taught me to read and speak Hebrew with the Ashkenazi pronunciation. Having left Europe before the Holocaust, the Ashkenazi pronunciation is what they knew.

When I made my first trip to Israel in 1974, I was lost: no one davened in Ashkenazi Hebrew, let alone spoke it. I resolved over the following years to change from Ashkenazi pronunciation to Sephardi, and I have generally been successful, although on occasion, the Ashkenazi version of some prayer pops back into my head.

Why did I make a point of changing? Because I believe one of the most important mitzvot is to work, both personally and communally, for the unity of klal Yisrael – the people of Israel.

I do not fault others of my generation or our parents for not changing their pronunciation. We simply become accustomed to one method of pronunciation, and it is difficult to change. However, there has been, of late, a more general and organized renewal of Ashkenazi Hebrew. Young people are being taught Ashkenazi pronunciation, and others, who had learned Sephardi, are being encouraged to convert to Ashkenazi. In my view, this development is most unfortunate.

What can be behind the renewal of Ashkenazi Hebrew? Perhaps some believe it is a return to a more authentic Judaism. This seems unlikely. Even the most ardent supporter of Ashkenazi renewal could not claim that Moshe Rabbeinu spoke with an Ashkenazi pronunciation.

Perhaps it is a nostalgia for the "pre-Holocaust European Jewish existence." If so, it is misguided. The "pre-Holocaust European Jewish existence" was, quite honestly, not so great. It certainly was not a life to which we would want to return. Neither of these reasons, nor others that I have heard, provide a convincing basis for the renewal of the Ashkenazi dialect.

You might say, "It's only words; not even the words, just their pronunciation." However, words have real meaning and even the manner in which those words are pronounced is important. In my opinion, those who advocate renewal of the Ashkenazi pronunciation are engaged in promoting "Jewish separatism." Their goal is to separate themselves from the rest of the Jewish people. In doing so, they are undermining the unity of klal Yisrael. If there is one thing we do not need, it is more divisions. We already divide ourselves in so many ways – politically and religiously, to name just two – that we should try not to divide ourselves linguistically.

Furthermore, the klal Yisrael of the 1990s stems from the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel. The renewal of the Ashkenazi dialect, however, demonstrates a preference for pre-Holocaust Hebrew over the dialect commonly used in Israel today. As such, and perhaps not coincidentally, the movement to renew the Ashkenazi dialect, is, at least implicitly, denying the state's existence.

It is important to stand for the unity of klal Yisrael and the integrity of Medinat Yisrael. Perpetuating linguistic divisions will accomplish neither.

My visit to a new Jewish museum

The largest Jewish community outside of Israel, the mega-city of greater New York, now has a place where the Holocaust is remembered in a special environment. The new Museum of Jewish Heritage is built on what is arguably the most beautiful and inspiring spot on the Isle of Manhattan. There, at its southern end, at the Battery across from the Statue of Liberty, this latest addition to New York's skyline and to Jewish remembrance has been erected. Recently, we were able to visit it, and this is a brief report on what the new museum has to offer.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The building, immediately recognizable by its hexagonal structure, is different from the famed Holocaust Museum in Washington. Instead of focusing on the Shoah – to which one of the three floors is in fact dedicated – two other floors are testaments to Jewish life rather than death. The first floor displays items relating to the roots of American Jewry: How the many millions had once led their lives in the shtetl or in large metropolitan centres like Warsaw, Berlin and London.

But there is another side to this floor, because it also shows how the migrants from the early days on up to World War II shaped their existence in the new world: who they were, what they did, how they contributed to the larger society and how they fashioned their American Jewish existence.

The second floor is filled with images of the Shoah. To me, the most memorable exhibits were six pillars covered with thousands of pictures of children who were murdered, together with an index where to find the photograph of the child that one might be looking for.

The third floor deals with the post-Holocaust era: building Jewish lives in Israel and in North America. In that sense it is the floor of hope, and shows the indomitable will of our people to embrace once again, not only a new physical existence but Jewish life as well.

It happens that my wife's family had lived in the United States since the early decades of the 19th century, and that the immediate members of my own family had escaped from the Nazis just prior to the outbreak of the war. Many years ago, when the musuem was in its planning stages, we were approached by its planners and asked whether we could contribute some everyday items from our home that would reflect on our families' lives in the old world and the new. Among the items we contributed (and there were many that had great sentimental, though little monetary value), were such everyday objects as the brass name plate in our apartment in Berlin, or the bundle of keys that Mother used for her duties in the Jewish orphanage in the city of which she and Dad were directors. Our photographs too were there – but we were told that much more was to come. In the early weeks of December, there was a program, part of which dealt with both our families through mementoes that illustrate the past.

The visit to the museum was a special experience because of such visual association.

Sar-El volunteers gofer the experience

By GORD GARSHOWITZ

Guest Voices

There are many ways to spend time in Israel as a volunteer. Some people teach English through Yad B'Yad, or in the United States through such programs as Teachers On Volunteer (TOV).

Other people work on archeological digs in Ashkelon, Jerusalem, Tel Morasha and various other places. You can work at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem or teach English through Young Judaea in the United States. Through Mogen David Adom, you can work on ambulances, and through organizations here, you can find several other volunteer opportunities.

I chose to go through Sar-El (acronym for Sheroot L'Yisrael – service to Israel) and work on an army base. Hundreds of people each year spend time on various army bases doing what is basically "gofer" type jobs. Obviously, they do not allow volunteers to drive tanks, but there are many jobs volutneers can do, such as working in warehouses or in the dining room, gardening, packing mess kits or assisting mechanics. This enables the soldiers to do the soldiering, and the miluim (reserves) to do other things, when they are called up.

While I was there, I was on one of two bases that had English-speaking volunteers. I was at Azur, near Holon, and we had eight American, three British, two South African, two Dutch, and one Mexican volunteer, besides me. Some bases had French-speaking people, others had Russians, some had Italians, and so on.

Our base was a small mechanical base. Repairs were done to the bulldozers and caterpillars used by the army engineers, and to the armored personnel carriers. My last week was spent working with a crew repairing treads, drive wheels and bearings.

Our work week, in theory, was five days, and evenings were ours. Sar-El arranged two evening educational programs a week, but other nights we went into Holon or Tel Aviv. We were also taken on two tours, one day to Beersheva, and a different day to Jerusalem. Weekends, we were able to tour, visit family or friends, or do whatever else we wanted. We had a madricha (guide) who helped us with the weekend plans – getting bus schedules and numbers, making hotel reservations, and so on.

Volunteers do not find out what base they are going to until they arrive in Israel. While there, I met people from bases at Beersheva, Ashkelon, Tiberias, and the air base Tel Nof. Through Sar-El, it is also possible to volunteer at Tel Hashomer Hospital.

The volunteers come in all shapes and sizes (and ages) and the madricha makes every effort to assign volunteers to a job they can handle. A key question asked of me during the registration process, was whether I was prepared to take orders from an 18-year-old on base, and whether or not I could handle the heat.

Would I do it again? Yes, in a minute, and hopefully next year I'll take along a few more people I know. Although I went during the summer, Sar-El does welcome volunteers throughout the year. For more information, call Esther at the Sar-El office in Toronto, 781-6089.

Rabbinic Reflections

We can be proud of our own beliefs

By RABBI MOSHE SHULMAN

There is a beautiful Sabbath custom that both parents bless their children Friday night. (Often the mother blesses the children upon candlelighting and the father right before kiddush).

At that time we say to our daughters, "May the Almighty guide you to be like Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah."

Interestingly enough, however, for our sons we do not make the parallel request, "May the Almighty guide you to be like Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." Instead, we substitute for our forefathers the two "grandchildren" tribes, Ephraim and Menasheh, sons of Joseph.

Historically, the reason for this switch is that when Jacob blesses Joseph's children, he says: "Through thee shall Israel bless, saying, 'G-d shall make thee as Ephraim and Menasheh." But why? Why should the two sons of Joseph stand as greater role models for our people than even the patriarchs themselves?

Ephraim and Menasheh were unique amongst all the tribes of Israel primarily because they were born and bred in exile. They did not live with Jacob and the rest of the tribes in Canaan. They grew up in Egypt. They were children of the Egyptian court. They were princes of Egypt.

How were they to react to the arrival of Joseph's family? How would they fit into the household of Jacob, a household with different values and different customs? Jacob and his family brought with them to Egypt all that Judaism believed in, which was foreign to Egyptian culture.

Joseph, still pretending to be the viceroy of Egypt to his brothers, could not even eat with his brothers because Egyptian society would not allow it. When the family stood before Pharaoh, at Joseph's request, they asked for land in Goshen, because their profession as shepherds was abhorrent to Egyptian culture.

To Ephraim and Menasheh, who grew up in the "cultured" "modern" society of Egypt, these values and customs might have seemed "old," "outdated," for another time, another place. It would have been so easy for them to have turned their backs on the beliefs of their grandfather, and look forward, accepting the values and customs of the more "modern" Egypt.

But they did not. Instead, they chose to be part of Jacob's family. "Ephraim and Menasheh, like Reuben and Shimon, they shall be mine." They chose to link themselves with their past, in order to live the present and the future with the values and beliefs of the heritage of Jacob.

Every Jewish parent, for generations to come, would turn to their children and say: "Be like Ephraim and Menasheh. Be part of a link of tradition and values which goes back thousands of years, and will continue to go forward for thousands more. Don't be tempted to say: 'the mitzvot that my grandparents kept are for a different time, a different place.' Be like Ephraim and Menasheh, and make those mitzvot and traditions part of your life whether in Egypt or Canada, Toronto or Israel."

This is especially important this time of year, when the whole world around us is caught up in their religious celebrations, and so many of our people are tempted to participate in that holiday spirit.

We must remember that we have our own heritage, our own holidays and our own spirituality. We do not need to turn our backs on Judaism in order to feel that we have to fit in. We can be proud of our own beliefs. We can be like Ephraim and Menasheh and remain steadfast and committed to the traditions and legacy of the Children of Israel to whom we belong.

"May the Almighty lead you to be like Ephraim and Menasheh, and like Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah."

More Israeli coins and medals

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we wrap up our survey of coins and medallions in Israel. At the same time, we'll look at the coin Israel minted to mark a Jewish tradition that dates back to the Torah.

Many of the coins minted in Israel are not legal tender but were created to commemorate a personality or a celebrity. The Israel Government Coins & Medals Corporation [http://www.coins.co.il/] was established in 1961 by the Israeli Government primarily to distribute State Medals and other collectibles. It has released a large and varied collection of items celebrating Israel and Jewish life: Israeli coins, banknotes, medallions, coin-jewelry, giant framed medals of the Lubavitcher Rebbe and the Baba Sali, as well as paintings by Chagall, Dali, Modigliani and Pissarro. The Corporation sells its merchandise online.

Another large private vendor of Jewish medals and coins is Commemoratives International [http://www.commem.com/]. The Connecticut-based company operates a large Web site which lists available products, everything from Palestine Coins [http://www.dtcc.edu/~berlin/palestin/palestin.htm] struck between 1927 and 1946, to a one-ounce gold coin struck this year to mark Israel's Jubilee [http://www.commem.com/prod01.htm]. That coin bears the timely inscription "And you shall sanctify the 50th year by declaring liberty throughout the land" (Leviticus 25:10) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/leviticu/torah/25102511.htm].

There are hundreds of other general sites on the Internet of interest to the budding numismatist. To get started, check out Yahoo [http://search.yahoo.com/bin/search?p=numismatics].

In the 1970s, the Israeli Government minted a series of coins with a unique purpose: to help fulfil a commandment from Torah.

Traditionally, the firstborn of Israel were supposed to be dedicated to God and expected to perform religious services for the priests, the kohanim (Exodus 13:1-2) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/12511302.htm#prtn_7].

According to the biblical command, the firstborn could be redeemed through a ceremony called pidyon haben [http://www.shamash.org/jb/bk961108/suppson.htm]. Although the ceremony is more rare than the brit, pidyon haben is still widely practised today. A month after the birth of the firstborn boy, the father "buys back" his son by paying a kohen five silver coins [http://www.virtualjerusalem.co.il/depts/torah/lifecycle/pidyon.htm].

From 1970 to 1977, the Israel Government Coins and Medals Corporation minted a series of commemorative silver pidyon haben coins [http://www.commem.com/images/1970%20Pidyon%20Ha Ben%20front.JPG] that were halachically certified by the Israeli Rabbinate [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/mail-jewish/volume22/v22n1].

Unfortunately, the Israeli pidyon haben coins are no longer being minted and are only available through collectors. But don't worry. Even if you can't get your hands on one of these coins, you can still buy back your son from the kohen. Any coins that are legal tender and have the required amount of silver will do.

A blueprint for men

Understanding Men's Passage: Discovering the New Map of Men's Lives*, by Gail Sheehy (Random House, $29.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

We like to think of ourselves as singular or unique. After all, don't we display individual needs, passions, doubts, dreams and concerns? But there is an unmistakable rhythm to life that affects us all. Without exception, we pass through a number of stages on our journey through the years. Psychologists now recognize that just as there are patterns to physical growth, so are there stages to human behavior and the development of personality.

Taking these inevitable stages into account, Gail Sheehy, a best-selling journalist and popular sociologist, has written a number of useful and readable guides to adult behavior.

Her latest book, based once again on original research and hundreds of interviews, charts the changing nature of men's lives in the middle years, and into the period of still evolving old age.

In effect, this volume is a blueprint for middle-aged men that shows them how to confront a wide variety of problems, from losing one's job to finding a new career; from impotence to renewed sexuality; from depression (now believed to be closely connected to heart disease) to struggling for a emotional regeneration.

In middlescence, many people begin to act in strange and erratic ways. The sense of limited time left leads to desperate attempts to recapture youth. A 50-year-old begins dressing in teenage styles. One or another marriage partner begins to think: "If I don't find somebody who is young and who will keep me alive, I'll never know joy."

It is a time when some abandon their business or profession for a liberated career. The pressures of middlescence sometimes shows themselves in unwarranted and uncontrollable anger towards one's family, or bitterness towards an employer, in wild energy or great lassitude. They express themselves in many ways, but everyone inevitably experiences them.

Among the author's major findings are these:

• The strongest factor in male survival is being married. In a large-scale study of survival factors in more than 7,000 American adults by the University of California at San Francisco, men from the ages of 45 to 64 who live with wives are twice as likely to live ten years longer than are their unmarried counterparts.

And that holds true despite differences in income and education and even among men with obvious risk factors such as smoking, drinking, obesity and sloth. There is something special about sharing daily life with a wife that protects men from depression.

• No one has discovered a cure for the common signs of aging. You can curse the phone book and watch television news instead of squinting at the newspaper, but sooner or later almost everyone in the early 40s finds the fine print blurring.

• We are never too old to benefit from exercise. Men who walk at least half an hour every day, six days a week, can cut their mortality rate in half compared to their sedentary counterparts of the same age. (That was the striking conclusion of a massive study on 13,000 men and women at the Copper Institute for Aerobics Research in Dallas, Texas.)

• After age 70, it is psychological attitude and behavior that mostly determine the quality and duration of the third stage of life, much more so than a man's genes. Therefore, successful aging in the later years becomes a career choice.

• In interviews, all of the professional men over 50 said that their spouses are their primary source of intimacy and comfort. They often acknowledge in interviews, "My wife has helped me to discover aspects of myself I never knew were there."

This engaging and anecdotal work about how men can redirect their lives is a guide to informed and intelligent self-renewal. Wives and female partners should be especially interested.

Innovation marks NCSY programs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Rabbi Glenn Black, 29, declines to take credit for the growth of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) since he began running it in the early 1990s.

His staff of eight full-timers and 15 part-timers regularly put in overtime, he said in a recent interview, and his board has encouraged innovation. "If I have a new idea, no one says, 'How much does it cost?' The vision is limitless. I don't think it's me at all, frankly."

When he took on the directorship of the organization at age 22, he had three full-time staff and two part-timers working in cramped quarters on Bathurst Street. For almost two years now, they've been headquartered in a more spacious basement office (4,200 square feet) in a Thornhill plaza.

Rabbi Black estimates NCSY "touches the lives" of 3,000 kids in Ontario and Quebec, about 1,200 of whom are actively involved.

Although the organization is under the auspices of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, participating students are from all walks of Jewish life.

Some 250 students a week come to NCSY offices, some to hang out, some to take classes at the organization's Free Torah High (with two locations, one in Thornhill and the other at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation), and others to participate in Shabbatons, or to pray at evening services or the new monthly Carlebach minyan – a 90-minute Friday night service with plenty of singing and dancing.

Other students access NCSY through its Hebrew Culture Club offered at a number of public high schools, or they spend Saturday nights taking part in athletic activities at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

The latter is a recent innovation, evidence of Rabbi Black's "sort of motto" to try at least one new thing a year. Their newest innovation is a girls' overnight camp integrating Judaic studies, to be launched next summer.

This past summer, NCSY sent 50 teens on a subsidized program to Israel at a cost of $500 per student. The organization also subsidizes over 40 students annually for year-long study programs in Israel.

With an annual budget of $1 million – most of it raised locally – NCSY allocates $350,000 a year in scholarships for summer programs and year-long yeshiva study in Israel.

"And we're just getting going," says Rabbi Black. Seven years ago, the entire annual budget was $350,000.

So why is it working? Indeed, why would kids want to go to a place that doesn't offer dances when everybody else is holding dances? asks Rabbi Black rhetorically. "I make the guys wear kippahs. At our Shabbatons, you have to pray three times a day. We're doing everything completely according to Jewish law."

He figures it's the "warm, non-confrontational environment" – which also extends to his home. He and his wife opened their sukkah to about 300 NCSYers this year, he said.

"We have been very successful in keeping kids involved in some level of Judaism."

He admits that some parents are not happy when their children become more observant through involvement with NCSY. He would like to address that issue by creating parallel or interwoven programs for parents.

Rabbi Black maintains there is no expectation that participants will become "frum," but stated his belief that learning does lead to change.

"We believe that if we are able to teach about Yiddishkeit in a warm and loving way, then kids will embrace it."

New Israel Fund launches New Generations group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Businessman Jonathan Latsky has served as chair of the New Israel Fund (NIF) of Canada's New Generations' group for less than a month, but he's hit the ground running in his bid to rejuvenate the 19-year old organization.

One of Latsky's first orders of business was to put out feelers in a search for a core group of 10 to 15 people to man a variety of important executive committee portfolios. Together with key staff people, the group will help move the NIF forward by enhancing its profile in the Jewish community, raising funds for worthy causes in Israel, and cultivating a cadre of young leaders, he said.

Latsky, who has started two businesses and one non-profit organization in the marketing field, is convinced that Canadians would rush to support the NIF if they were made aware of all its good work.

"The New Israel Fund is a relatively young organization. I think it's never had a real push in Canada. That why awareness of it is low," he said.

Latsky believes the NIF's goals have tremendous appeal to average Canadians since they closely parallel the core values of Canadian society. Advocating for human and civil rights and for government accountability are key components of the movement, he said.

"I'm an entrepreneur, a right-leaning person and this organization speaks to me," Latsky added.

Since it was established in 1979, the NIF has supported more than 200 Israeli organizations that promote democracy, civil and human rights, religious pluralism, tolerance and Jewish-Arab co-existence. Groups like the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), the NIF's largest grantee; HEMDAT: The Public Committee for the Freedom of Science, Religion and Culture in Israel; the Israel Women's Network; and Adam Teva V'Din: Israeli Union for Environmental Defence, are among the beneficiaries of NIF grants.

NIF also supports Shatil (Hebrew for seedling), an NIF division that provides free consulting services to not-for-profit organizations in Israel, said Minda Davis, director of NIF Canada.

"As Israel moves into another phase after building its physical plant, there is a focus on building the country's social fabric," Davis said.

New immigrants, for example, come to Israel from over 100 countries, most of which have no democratic tradition. These olim often don't know how to access their rights, she said.

In the last five years, NIF Canada has transferred an average of $500,000 to Israeli grass roots organizations. This year appears to be a particular good year, with more than $1 million expected to be transferred, she said.

Latsky believes those numbers can only go up if more and more people are attracted to the organization. For NIF Canada's leadership core, "we are looking for professionals, accomplished business-people who have a strong interest in what the NIF is all about," he said.

Although planning is still in preliminary stages, Latsky said he expects that group would chair committees that might focus on areas like programming, marketing, membership retention, education and strategic alliances.

The new generation group will be centred in Toronto to start, "but we're looking to expand to include people from Montreal" who might participate in executive meetings by teleconferencing, he added.

For more information about New Generations or other NIF activities, contact NIF assistant director Talya Rotem-Assaf at (416) 781-4322.

Lasers aid in medical field

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lasers have opened up many new opportunities for treatment and diagnosis in the medical field, according to the head of the division of medical physics of the Ontario Cancer Institute.

Recent advances include the use of laser technology to remove port wine stains in children, said Dr. Brian Wilson, using dramatic before-and-after slides to illustrate his point. He spoke at the national annual meeting of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, held recently at the Sutton Place Hotel.

Lasers (the word derives from Light Amplification by Stimulated Emission of Radiation) can be precise enough to drill a hole in an egg cell, yet gentle enough to pick up a single sperm and take it to that hole to fertilize the egg, Wilson said.

Lasers can also be powerful enough to break up kidney stones or drill holes in a heart (a recently developed technique for re-oxygenating damaged heart muscle), he said.

Waxing poetic for a moment, Wilson noted that lasers can be used to increase beauty in the world, returning a smile to a baby's face or revealing the glory that is a cell. A photo of an infant with a disfiguring facial growth illustrated the former use.

Although lasers can be used for frivolous purposes – Wilson cited a laser spud peeler that burns off potato skin – there's no doubt, he said, that "some applications have made the whole endeavor worthwhile. Lasers are contributing to what's called the new medicine, playing a role in the evolution of medical technology."

He voiced doubts, however, about the effectiveness of using laser therapy to quit smoking.

Other medical uses for lasers include treatment and early detection of particular cancers, treatment of some eye conditions, rapid wound repair on the battlefield (with the help of a laser pen), and even removal of tattoos and wrinkles.

Lasers also have non-medical applications like the restoration of fine works of art, sending telecommunications signals or monitoring the progress of a mudslide, he said.

It's been said that lasers are like sex, Wilson commented dryly. "The first time you hear about it, you just can't believe it."

Laser and optical science research are among the newer areas on which Weizmann is focusing, said Haim Harari, who has just begun his third five-year term as president of the institution.

Torontonian Paul Brumer, a University of Toronto chemistry professor, and Moshe Shapiro, a chemical physics professor at Weizmann, received a Nobel prize nomination earlier this year for their joint research in that area.

The institute's current international three-year Jubilee fundraising campaign, to double its $250 million (US) endowment, will be earmarked each year for a small number of its top scientists who require "an extra push."

The main thrust of the Canadian effort, said Harari, is to create an interdisciplinary project for laser and optical science research, with "spin-offs in many directions."

It was also announced at the meeting that, among the major Jubilee campaign gifts is a donation from Murray and Marvelle Koffler and family earmarked for women's health research, including breast cancer research. The family has also funded a chair in breast cancer research at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

Sharon Zuckerman continues as president of the Canadian society. Gloria Snow, national executive director, is leaving Weizmann next month to work for UJA Federation.

'Traveller' turns to music

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At age 65 when a lot of people are calling it quits, Dr. Jerry Gray of The Travellers is retiring from dentistry and beginning a career as a full-time professional musician.

"Who knows what the future holds?" said Gray, who is about to give up his dental practice in Burlington and take on bookings for his folk-singing and banjo-playing performances.

If the reaction of the Friends of Yiddish (FOY) audience at the Workmen's Circle recently is any criterion, Gray is well on his way.

They gave him and his colleagues, son James of Blue Rodeo at the keyboard, and bassist Joe Hampson, a rousing heartfelt ovation.

Gray, after all, has been singing folk songs for 45 years under The Travellers banner, and the first public meeting of the Friends of Yiddish 15 years ago featured The Travellers as guest performers.

"He was just as good then as he is today," said Les Nirenberg, one of the FOY founders. It was FOY president, Eda Zimmler Schiff, and her husband, Marvin, who heard Gray sing at a fund-raiser about a year ago and decided to book him again.

Gray's eclectic repertoire at the latest FOY concert included songs of peace in English and Hebrew, some Yiddish folk gems which included one from his public debut at age four singing a liedel at the old Strand Theatre, and a howlingly funny song titled Benign Prostatic Hyperplasia in which the audience joined in.

At times, Gray stepped back and let hs son and Hampson sing solos. Hampson, who is non-Jewish, delighted everyone with a Yiddish song that he had to learn at great expense during a long-distance phone call from a Jewish friend in Chicago.

Whether it was songs Gray sang at Camp Naivelt years ago, or songs he made popular in many countries with The Travellers, the evening was suffused with pure nostalgia.

The occasion was the annual FOY Chanukah concert, Khanuke Huliankei.

החיים יפים:

רוברטו בניני הוא איטלקי קטן , מצחיק עד דמעות ונוגע ללב, שיצר את אחד הסרטים הכי טובים שתיראו השנה. "Life is Beautiful" כבר זכה בפסטיבל קאן, ואהיה מאוד מופתע אם לא יזכה באוסקר לסרט הזר בעוד חודשים ספורים. זהו סיפור אהבתו של איש קטן לאשה יפה שמעדיפה אותו על ארוסה העשיר בשל היותו אנושי, רומנטי ומצחיק. בחלקו הראשון של הסרט צוחק הקהל בפה מלא על הסלפסטיק המעשעשים שנושא בניני. רק אז נודע לצופה לראשונה שהוא בעצם יהודי והוא, בנו ואשתו (הנוצרית) נשלחים למחנות המוות. הסרט הוא פארודיה ציונית ונוקבת על גזענות בדרך כלל וגזענות נגד יהודים בפרט. כשהילד שואל את אביו: „אבא, למה כתוב על החנות הזו שהכניסה ליהודים וכלבים אסורה?" עונה לו האבא: "יש כל מיני חנויות, אני מכיר אחת שכתוב עליה שהכניסה לארנבות ולאנגלים אסורה, ומה דעתך שעל חנות הספרים שלנו נכתוב שהכניסה לפקיסטנים וצרצרים אסורה?" חוט השני של הסרט הוא נסיונו של האבא לספר לבנו שכל חווית מחנה ההשמדה היא בעצם משחק שצריך לצבור בו אלף, נקודות כדי לנצח. בקטע מחנה ההשמדה אין הקהל צוחק יותר. אבל האופטימיות של האבא הקטן מדביקה את הבן שלו ומשאירה את שניהם בחיים. רק בסוף הסרט מתברר לצופים שזה לא הולך להיות הפי אנד והם עוזבים את האולם דומעים והמומים. במחשבה שניה, לא ניתן היה לסיים סרט כזה בסוף טוב, כי זה היה הופך את חוויית השואה לכמעט קומדיה. ההצדעה לבניני כפולה ומכופלת: גם סרט נפלא על השואה, על ילדים, על אהבה, וגם סרט סימבולי ברמה ציאפליניית. ראיתי אותו, את בניני הקטן, מתראיין אצל דיויד לֶטרמן. למרות האנגלית הרצוצה שבפיו הוא הצליח להצחיק את הקהל. שאל אותו לֶטרמן: "איך מגיבים באיטליה על הצלחת הסרט ועל זה שזכית בפסטיבל קאן?" עונה לו בניני: " אה , זה כלום. אבל כשהם שמעו שאני אהיה בתוכנית של לֶטרמן, אוהו!" זהו סרט עשר בסולם קורן.

בדרום לבנון ממשיכים ילדים ישראליים בני שמונה עשרה ומעלה לתת את חייהם. ממולם עומדות מיליציות מקומיות, מאומנות היטב, חדורות מוטיבציה שמאמינות שהן מגינות על שטחי ארצם. המט"כל טוען באופן עקבי שנסיגת כוחות ישראל לגבול הבינלאומי תביא לכך שישובי הצפון יותקפו. ממול המט"כל עומדים אלה שאומרים שאין לכך שום ראיה ושבעבר התקיפו החיזבאללה את שטחי ישראל רק כשפגעו במהנדסים. מעניין לציין שאריק שרון, שיזם את הכניסה ללבנון ב - 1982 תומך בנסיגה הדרגתית, ואי אפשר להאשים את אריק שהוא תומך בכך תוך סיכון ביטחון ישראל. הלחץ הציבורי על הממשלה להגיב בנסיגה הולך ועולה מפגיעה לפגיעה. ואפילו ראש הממשלה כבר הבין שזו לא עוד הפגנה של"שלום עכשיו". לדעתי האישית, הבעיה העיקרית של ישראל היא בכך שאם ניסוג, זו תהיה הפעם הראשונה בהסטוריה שצה"ל נסוג כדי להוריד במספר הנפגעים. יש בכך בעיני רבים מעין הודעת כניעה. הודעה שמודעה- בכל פעולה צבאית צריך לשאול: האם זה שווה את חיינו של ילד ישראלי אחד? ולאלה שמאמינים שהחיזבאללה יפגיז ויציק לישובי הצפון ולנוסעים בכביש הצפון - מה מפריע לצה"ל לחזור לשם בצורה זו או אחרת? הרי צה"ל כצבא, חזק עשרות מונים מן המיליציות של לבנון. הן פשוט טובות יותר במלחמת גרילה, כפי שתמיד היתה המציאות של צבא סטאטי גדול נגד פרטיזנים מקומיים שנלחמים על בתיהם. תחשבו על זה.

Applications available for Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel

ALBANY, N.Y. — Applications are now available for the 1999 Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel.

The Fellowships, now in their 13th year, offer an opportunity for 26 students entering 12th grade to spend five weeks in Israel this summer.

Fellows will be chosen based on character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the standard for selection.

While living in Jerusalem, Bronfman Fellows participate in seminars and dialogues with a diverse rabbinic faculty, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs and meet with some of Israel's prominent political and literary figures to examine contemporary issues in light of Jewish history and tradition.

In addition, for the second year, the Samuel Bronfman Foundation will sponsor a parallel group of outstanding young Israeli high school students, called Amitei Bronfman. The program is run in cooperation with Mifashim, part of Charles Bronfman's CRB Foundation which for the past four years has run joint educational programming for Israeli and Diaspora youth.

The Israeli fellows, like their American counterparts, will undergo a rigorous selection process and represent a cross-section of contemporary Israel society. They will have their own educational programming as well as a week-long encounter with the North American fellows.

The program begins on June 28, 1999, with a two-day seminar in New York City. The students return from Israel on Aug. 4, 1999. All meals will be kosher, and group activities on the Sabbath will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

All expenses are covered by the program, including round-trip international transportation, room and board, travel in Israel and incidentals.

High school students in the United States and Canada entering 12th grade in the fall of 1999 may obtain an application form and detailed information by mail at The Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel, 17 Wilbur Street, Albany, NY, 12202; by telephone at 518-465-6575; by fax at 518-432-8984; by e-mail at [yfi@bronfman.org] or on the Web at [www.bronfman.org.]

Completed applications must be postmarked no later than Jan. 29, 1999. Finalists will be notified March 1, 1999 and interviews will be held during the week of March 14, 1999. Names of Fellowship recipients will be announced on March 31, 1999.

Cappe is new Privy Council Clerk

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada's next top bureaucrat – one of the most powerful people in the land – is described as a Jean Chrétien loyalist and an advocate of a strong central government.

Mel Cappe, 50, will succeed Jocelyne Bourgon Jan. 18 as clerk of the Privy Council, a post that combines the political with the bureaucratic.

Cappe was born in Toronto, and attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute. He had his bar mitzvah at Adath Israel Synagogue by Rabbi Erwin Schild.

As a teenager, he was active in United Synagogue Youth and B'nai Brith Youth Organization.

Today, he and his wife, Marni (née Pliskin) are members of Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa.

Mel Cappe

An economist by training, Cappe has a long history of civil service, going back 23 years. Most recently, he was deputy minister of human resources development and deputy minister of the environment.

Cappe told reporters last week that he's "honored" by his new appointment and looks "forward to helping the prime minister make Canada a better place."

His demanding new job is not easily definable, but it breaks down into three main areas: He'll head Canada's public service, ensuring that the roughly 200,000 federal employees maintain efficiency; the clerk is also secretary to the Cabinet, and he will serve the cabinet's collective needs; and perhaps most importantly, Cappe will be the prime minister's principal adviser – essentially Chrétien's deputy minister. The two will meet for about 30 minutes every day to discuss all aspects of government business and the civil service.

In other words, not much happens in Ottawa without the clerk's knowledge and input.

Past and present colleagues described Cappe as a believer in a strong central and activist government, as well as a tough manager with high standards.

Cappe and his wife have two children. Daniel, 22, is a computer science student at Queen's University, and Emily, 20, lives and works in Vancouver.

Collection on view

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A selection of books from the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of rare Hebraica and Judaica is now on view at the National Library of Canada.

At the opening of the exhibit, entitled Ashkenaz: A Celebration of German Jewry, Tom Delsey, acting on behalf of the national librarian, described the Lowy Collection as one of the pre-eminent collections of the library.

A 45-minute slide presentation with accompanying commentary by Lowy Collection curator Cheryl Jaffee told the audience of about 70 guests about some of the books on display.

Speaking of how the exhibit had evolved, Jaffee said, "I did something very ambitious. I did a bird's-eye view of 1,000 years. My goal was to remind people what there is to remember, so I went from the beginning of the flourishing of Ashkenaz in the 10th century right through to the 20th century – truly 1,000 years."

Highlights of the exhibit include the first complete Talmud ever printed in Germany – in the late 17th century – on which there are knotted strands of wool from a tallit, which were found inside the book.

One of the treasures of the Lowy collection is an 18th-century Haggadah that was printed in 1763 in Altona, Germany. The book, with its bright, deep colors in a folkloric style, is unique.

Also on display is the first Talmud to be printed in Germany after World War II. Printed in 1948, it was for the use of the displaced persons in the camps.

The exhibit opened on Dec. 7 and continues until Jan. 20, 1999. The library is open every day from 7 a.m. until 11 p.m. including Sundays and holidays.

Canadian activist protests new Israeli highway

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Protesters rally against construction of Highway 6 in Israel.

TORONTO — A Canadian activist protesting against the construction of Israel's first toll highway, is not about to give up the fight, although most environmental groups have already abandoned the cause.

"As they say, 'It ain't over 'till it's over' and I'm going to do everything in my power to stop this project," said Henry Gold. The former Montrealer is leading Green Action, an Israeli environmental group, in its campaign against the construction of Highway 6, which ironically is being built by an international consortium led by Canadian Highways International Corp.

"I think every person who cares about Eretz Yisrael should support us," he said.

On a recent visit with friends in Toronto, Gold, 46, a Jerusalem resident since 1993, told The CJN he objects to the project because the proliferation of roads and cars is bad for the environment, and the new toll road will only benefit a small group of wealthy Israelis.

Many people have tried to discourage him from waging a public relations battle with the developers and politicians, he said.

"I was told nothing can be done, that it is impossible to do anything...They say this is a David and Goliath battle, in that we're taking on tremendous economic powers."

But Gold is not one to be swayed by naysayers. A professional social activist, he is the founding director of Canadian Physicians for Aid and Relief (CPAR).

From 1984 to 1993, he coordinated relief operations in Africa, and he said that during his tenure, CPAR, which now operates on a multi-million-dollar budget, became a model for other international relief organizations.

"We were told that nothing could be done to help. But through the initiative and perseverance of three or four people, we were able to save thousands of people. We refused to take a defeatist attitude. And it's the same thing now."

He said he opposes the construction of Highway 6, which is modelled after Highway 407 in Ontario, because it will only be used by rich Israelis who can afford to pay the substantial toll costs; essentially the government is taking a huge financial risk to spare wealthy people the inconvenience of rush hour gridlock.

Gold criticized the deal signed between the Israeli government and the international consortium set to build the road: the government will guarantee up to 80 percent of any losses the consortium incurs on the project, estimated to cost $3 billion (US).

Gold predicts that the toll highway will be under-utilized by the public, and thus be a money loser for the consortium and ultimately the government.

Citing an article about Highway 407 in the November issue of Toronto Life, Gold said the magazine reported that Highway 407 is not well used because few people want to pay the cost of the tolls, and he foresees the same scenario occurring in Israel.

Estimates that Highway 6 would stimulate $15 billion in economic benefits is incorrect because "the formula they used to justify these high numbers is obsolete," he said.

"There is an assumption that the road building will kick-start the economy by creating several thousand jobs. Unfortunately, I wish it were true. But it's not, because most of the people who are going to be working on the highway are foreign workers.

"In Canada, construction jobs – at least government construction jobs – are well paying, but in Israel they hire foreigners to do this kind of labor because they work for less money...Israelis won't work for such low wages."

According to Gold, the auditor general of Israel and even Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in his pre-election campaign, called for a re-evaluation of the project.

"It's simply nonsensical," Gold said. "Both the government and the public know it. This is a project that is poorly thought out, poorly designed, which will cause irreversible damage.

"Israel is such a small country with so little green space. Any project of this magnitude should be assessed and re-assessed. There should be a public inquiry before they start building."

Gold accused the government of spending money on highways at the expense of public transportation. For instance, the train connecting Tel Aviv to Jerusalem is no longer operating because the tracks are supposedly unsafe, he noted.

"Rather than invest money in saving and improving the train, the government's priority is to build highways...To add insult to injury, the land that belonged to the train authority has been allocated for the highway.

"The Israelis have adopted the California mentality of 40 years ago, basing a system of transportation on a model to build more and more roads – to create urban sprawl, traffic jams and pollution."

Audience in awe of survivor

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 200 men, women and children in a Halifax audience sat in quiet awe as Holocaust survivor Helena Jockel told her story.

More than a few people wiped tears from their eyes as she told of the horrors she and so many others experienced in her year of incarceration at Auschwitz and other Nazi death camps between 1944 and 1945. And when she concluded her speech, the audience at Dalhousie University's Student Union Building rose in tribute to her courage.

Jockel, who came to Halifax 10 years ago, was the keynote speaker during celebrations of the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. With her voice breaking, yet strong, she urged the young people in the audience to "please, please, please be good to each other, help each other.

"This world is your world. Please make it a nice and happy world for everybody, no matter what his religion, color of his skin, sexual orientation, or if he is damaged by nature or accident."

Speeches, dramatic presentations, songs and the first Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission journalism awards highlighted the two-hour session.

Jockel, born in Czechoslovakia, and a Hungary resident during the war, was taken to the camp during the German occupation. A university graduate and teacher, she spent three weeks in an open ghetto with no shelter and little food and water. Transferred by cattle car to Auschwitz, she survived through what she termed "a humiliating experience."

Jockel said the Germans, realizing the war was lost and wanting to destroy any witnesses, loaded everyone into cattle cars in January 1945 and sent them to four other camps. "I don't have the strength today to describe the suffering there until the time we were liberated. Maybe another place, another time."

Halifax Jewish university student Lauren Abrahams thanked Jockel, and reminded the students in the audience that "human rights abuses still go on. It's up to all of us, but especially you leaders of tomorrow to end these atrocities.

"You can stand up when you see someone being picked on because of differences in their appearance or religion or race. It's up to you to build a better tomorrow."

The event also featured a presentation by Voices, an African-Canadian theatre and music group, which offered a brief history of black life and struggles in Nova Scotia.

Human Rights Day was sponsored by the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission, Canadian Human Rights Commission, Canadian Heritage, Human Resources Development Canada, Atlantic Jewish Council, Dalhousie University Public Administration Student's Society, Cultural Awareness Youth Group of Nova Scotia and Scotiabank.

Hebrew educators meet

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A recent professional development day, co-sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and Jewish Family Services of Ottawa, attracted more than 60 Hebrew school educators.

In her keynote address, Frances Pearlman, a teacher from Bloomfield, Minn., told the teachers that "as a teacher of Torah, I find that I am constantly looking at the world through Jewish eyes. We have to be able to understand that the content itself is not sufficient. Every teacher has to be a model...it is very important for the children to see that the teacher practices what she teaches."

She urged the teachers to remember that they "have taken on an awesome responsibility, using your Jewish life to model Jewish life."

Pearlman also led workshops on alternative Holiday Programming. Other workshops included dealing with different learning styles, learning disabilities, and multi-level classroom instruction.

Zelaine Shinder, chair of the Board of Jewish Education praised Lauren Shaps, a social worker with the student support program of Jewish Family Services for recognizing the need for the professional development day, and presenting the idea to BJE.

Israelis lower their guard as Iraq bombing ends

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — With the end of the U.S. and British air strikes against Iraq, Israel has lowered its preparations against a possible Iraqi attack.

But Israeli officials say they see the halting of the strikes as a lull in the ongoing crisis with Iraq, and not an end to it.

During the recent crisis, Patriot anti-missile batteries were stationed outside major Israeli cities. But with the halt to the strikes over the weekend, the batteries were moved back to army bases. Patriots were used during the 1991 Gulf War to try to intercept Scud missiles fired by Iraq at Israel.

The Israeli army was expected to release hundreds of reservists who had been called up as a preventive measure. Gas mask distribution centres also reduced their operations, which were increased last week.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said the situation in Iraq would still have to be closely watched.

Most Israelis reacted to the latest tension in the Gulf with indifference. Gas mask distribution centres reported a low turnout of people seeking to update their kits.

The tensions did have a major impact, however, in the West Bank, where Palestinians and Israeli troops clashed Saturday during pro-Iraq demonstrations.

More than 100 Palestinians were reported wounded in the clashes. The Palestinian Authority, trying to restrict demonstrations of solidarity for Iraq, detained a number of Palestinian journalists covering the events.

On Sunday, the Palestinian Authority also lifted a ban on foreign news organizations that had attempted to cover Palestinian demonstrations in support of Iraq.

Palestinian officials had imposed the ban in an effort to squelch reports about the demonstrations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a source of embarrassment to the self-rule government, which has sought improved ties with the United States.

Cape Town shul bombed

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — South African Jews are outraged by the bombing of a synagogue in a suburb of Cape Town early last Friday, which some suspect of being perpetrated by Muslims protesting the U.S. bombardment of Iraq.

Nobody was hurt in the explosion, which occurred just after midnight, about two hours after congregants had left the synagogue following a Chanukah party.

But the blast shattered the ornate stained-glass doors and windows inside the synagogue, one of the oldest in Cape Town.

"Thank God, nobody was hurt and there was no damage to anything inside the sanctuary," said Mickey Glass, executive director of the Union of Orthodox Synagogues in Cape Town.

The blast rocked the entire suburb of Wynberg, once a stronghold of Cape Town Jewry, and now an area occupied by a large number of Muslims.

Misguided missiles

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Even if Iraqi military facilities sustained severe damage in the four days of bombing by American and British forces, there is no sign that Iraq's weapons of mass destruction were hit.

Analysis

The sanctions imposed on Baghdad will undoubtedly continue, but it is unlikely that the UN inspections will be renewed at a serious level.

In short, the end result is that Saddam Hussein will go on manufacturing weapons of mass destruction, perhaps even more intensively than before.

A key question is what effect the results of the operation will have on Iran. Will those responsible for manufacturing deadly weapons in that country decide that they have to accelerate their projects even more because Saddam Hussein is going to obtain such weapons? Intelligence sources say the Iranian program has been proceeding at full tilt for some time, regardless of what Iraq is doing.

It is clear that Iraq sustained damage, but the scale is not yet known. Only U.S. and British intelligence know why the various targets were chosen. However, even if they knew where the illicit weapons were being hidden, they have no way of knowing whether the weapons were buried under the rubble of the buildings razed to the ground by the Tomahawk cruise missiles.

It is not clear if the operation was meant to last four days or whether the decision to stop was taken in midstream. Nor is it clear whether the Americans and the British will be willing to resume the bombing if they find targets where weapons are manufactured or stored. Perhaps they will act only if Iraq actually attacks one of its neighbors.

If Saddam Hussein concludes that the danger has passed, he will find this a spur to continue the production of his deadly weapons. In that case Operation Desert Fox will go down as a failure.

Elections in Israel likely

• acknowledge that the Wye accord does not call on Israel to release any Palestinian prisoners with blood on their hands;
• stop inciting violence among the Palestinian people;
• confiscate illegal weapons; and
• reduce the Palestinian police force to the size specified in the Oslo accords.

The prime minister sought the Cabinet vote to shore up right-wing support in advance of the crucial Knesset vote on Monday.

Stirring up an already agitated political scene ahead of Monday's vote to dissolve the Knesset, former chief of staff Amnon Shahak said on the weekend that he had decided to run for prime minister at the head of a new centrist party, not as part of a ticket with Labor party chief Ehud Barak.

Barak, who is also a former chief of staff, tried unsuccessfully to dissuade Shahak from this course, arguing that if they divided their forces the beneficiary would be Netanyahu.

Sources close to Shahak told Ha'aretz that "the goal is not to save the Labor party but to oust Netanyahu. Amnon can do it, and that is what is important."

Some of the prime minister's aides were counselling him to call an election within 60 days. This would effectively neutralize the entry of Shahak into the prime ministerial elections.

Shahak is still formally in the IDF and is thus legally ineligible to run for office. As the law now stands, Shahak has to undergo a "cooling off" period of 100 days after his formal discharge from the military. For him to avoid the cooling off period, the consent of President Ezer Weizman would be necessary.

Some of those in Netanyahu's close circle suggested another way by which he could neutralize both Shahak and former Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo. If Netanyahu were to resign, elections would be held for the position of prime minister only – and only currently serving MKs would be eligible to run under the law.

Much of the talk about early elections has focused on the possible formation of a new, centrist party and who would lead it.

Among the names put forward as possible candidates for the new party are Shahak, Milo and Likud Knesset member Dan Meridor.

An opinion poll indicated that Shahak would be Netanyahu's most formidable challenger if new elections were held.

Shahak's possible candidacy raised concern in the Labor party, which views him as someone who could split the vote with Labor leader, Ehud Barak, and force a runoff between one of them and Netanyahu.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 14

• President Bill Clinton thanked Palestinian leaders for rejecting the anti-Israel clauses in the Palestinian charter during a public vote on the matter by the PNC, which he attended. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu accepted the outcome of the Gaza meeting.

Dec. 15

• Netanyahu criticized Clinton for equating the children of Palestinians jailed for murder with the children of Israeli victims of terror. (Clinton subsequently apologized for his remarks.)

Dec. 16

• Netanyahu told the cabinet he would not meet a Friday deadline for carrying out the next West Bank redeployment called for under the Wye accords. The Palestinians had yet to fulfil a number of Wye commitments, Netanyahu said.

Dec. 17

• Iraq is unlikely to target Israel as it did during the 1991 Gulf War, according to Israeli army intelligence officials. Just the same, some 90 gas mask distribution centres opened after the United States and Britain launched Operation Desert Fox against Iraq.

• Former prime minister Shimon Peres said two Israelis charged with spying in Cyprus were trying to stop a terrorist act against the Jewish state. The arrest of the two Mossad agents has fuelled suspicion that the men were acting on behalf of Turkey.

Dec. 18

• In the wake of Operation Desert Fox, some 800 British tourists have left Israel, after British tour organizers in Eilat warned their clients to make an immediate departure. However, other air traffic to and from Israel has proceeded normally.

• The next elections may be conducted under the old system, if a bill to annul the direct election of the prime minister is passed on its first Knesset reading Dec. 22, said MK Hanan Porat, who chairs the Knesset's constitution, law and justice committee. (A bill to dissolve the Knesset was also on the same day's legislative agenda.)

Covenant annulled; what's next?

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The gathering of hundreds of Palestinian representatives in the Gaza Strip last week felt like a remake of an old movie.

The members of the Palestine National Council (PNC), along with other groups, jumped to their feet and raised their hands to show President Bill Clinton that they no longer seek Israel's destruction.

Their actions bore a striking resemblance to what they did in the spring of 1996, when the group voted by an overwhelming majority in favor of a vaguely worded resolution amending the covenant "by annulling clauses which contradict the exchange of letters between the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] and the government of Israel on Sept. 9 and 10, 1993."

The script was almost identical, and so were the protagonists. The actors, members of the PNC reinforced by newcomers, seemed tired; but the censor, Israel, wanted yet another scene, before it would approve the film's release.

And as on the earlier occasion, this week's vote, which passed by an overwhelming majority, was met with praise.

Clinton thanked Palestinian leaders in the Gaza Strip for rejecting the anti-Israel clauses in the Palestinian charter. Even Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who had sought a formal vote annulling the clauses, said he accepted the outcome of the Gaza meeting.

But it remained unclear whether the move would end the more than 30-year controversy surrounding the covenant and solve the latest stumbling block in the peace talks.

The PNC was formed in 1964 as the supreme legislative body of the Palestinian people. Long known as the Palestinian parliament-in-exile, the PNC was supposed to be elected directly by the Palestinian people, but these elections never materialized.

Its influence has waned in recent years, with the formation of the Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian Council, which represent Palestinians living in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

The charter was adopted at what later became known as the first meeting of the PNC. On June 2, 1964, at the Ambassador Hotel in eastern Jerusalem, the 33 articles of the Palestinian charter were approved – 28 of which negate Israel's right to exist and call for its annihilation.

It is those articles that Israel has insisted be revoked.

Some of the clauses do, indeed, sharply contrast with the current Palestinian policy of coexistence. The first three articles declare that the Palestinian people have the sole right to Palestine in its pre-1948 borders.

According to Article 9, "Armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine," and Article 19 says, "The partition of Palestine in 1947 and the establishment of the State of Israel are entirely illegal."

For the past 10 years, even before the Oslo process, Palestinian leaders had said the covenant was no longer in effect.

On Sept. 9, 1993, prior to the signing of the Oslo accords, Palestine Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat wrote a letter to Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin committing himself to changing the clauses negating Israel's right to exist and those that contradict the Palestinian promise to refrain from violence.

After Netanyahu took over as prime minister, and after the Palestinians failed to come through on their promise to redraft the covenant, the issue heated up once again.

Last January, Arafat spelled out in a letter to Clinton the 28 articles that would be annulled. The PLO Executive Committee and Central Council ratified the letter last week, and the PNC, joined by others, approved it in front of the president last week.

But despite the initial positive reviews, it remains to be seen whether this latest scene in the Israeli-Palestinian drama will lead to tangible progress in the peace process, or whether it will just be another burst of optimism that wanes over time.

Millennium tourists concern officials

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem police and psychiatrists are worried about the possible influx of tourists and pilgrims this coming Christmas and throughout 2000.

While politicians and tourism officials are touting the hype for the millennium as a good thing for the economy and for publicity, police and psychiatrists are already dreading what they're up against.

"In two years time, Jerusalem will be in the centre of mankind," Mayor Ehud Olmert told a small press conference. "We have to get Jerusalem ready, beautify the city. We are expecting millions of people."

And it is these millions – tourists and doomsday cults – that have police and hospital staff worried.

Dr. Yair Bar-El, director of Jerusalem's Kfar Shaul State Mental Health Hospital, said there are three mental disorders that afflict tourists. He and his staff are doing all they can to prepare.

"We are currently in a process of discussing with the Palestinians what to do," Bar-El told The Canadian Jewish News, referring to the problems the Palestinians will encounter in Bethlehem. "We are teaching them how to detect the mental disorders early and to treat them."

Overwhelmed by the impact of the city's religious and historical heritage, many people come to Jerusalem, and believe themselves to be characters in the Bible, he said. Some are temporarily deranged, while others are violent and cause damage to holy sites throughout the city.

In 1992, a U.S. Christian went into a violent rage in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, smashed lamps and tore down the cross marking the traditional site of the crucifixion of Jesus.

Bar-El said this type of behavior belongs to the group of people who possess "strange beliefs that they can do something in Jerusalem to provoke change in the society and religion."

He said this type of person is generally not mentally diseased, but is dangerous, and can cause extensive harm. Ninety percent of those afflicted with this type of disorder are Protestant, said Bar-El, suggesting this could be because, in their beliefs, Jerusalem is the only holy place.

More recently, police refused entry into Israel to two Christians they learned had intended to carry out an attack on the Temple Mount "to precipitate Armageddon." Police would not comment on this incident or other security plans for the millennium.

There are two other groups of people afflicted by Jerusalem's mystique. Those affected include Jews, Christians of all denominations, and Muslims, said Bar-El.

One group is comprised of people who have real psychiatric problems and decide that they must come to Jerusalem. "They arrive here identifying with the figures of the Bible," said Bar-El, adding they too are dangerous, as they often act out.

The other includes people who are "not really mental, but have strange feelings," said Bar-El. This affliction, which tends to last approximately seven days, has been termed the Jerusalem syndrome. Bar-El has studied this phenomnon for over a decade, but can trace it back much further.

He cited the example of an English Christian woman who was certain of Christ's second coming in the 1930s, and who would climb up Mount Scopus to welcome Jesus back to earth with a cup of tea.

Another example is that of a Canadian Jew claiming to be Samson, who tried to smash through a wall of a room to prove his identity.

This group, said Bar-El, is not dangerous to the public, although they can be disruptive.

While there is a lot of speculation about the cause of the Jerusalem syndrome, Bar-El suggested that people go temporarily crazy because the "deep subconscious of a person can't cope with the internal images and the real images" of holy places in Jerusalem.

About 150 foreign visitors each year, said Bar-El, are affected by one of the disorders. Hospital staff estimate this number will at least double over the course of the year, as the number of tourists increases with the coming of the millennium.

There are currently three tourists in the Kfar Shaul Hospital suffering from Jerusalem syndrome. Bar-El said his staff treats people throughout the year, but during Passover and Christmas, the numbers tend to rise.

Christian sufferers tend to break down at traditional sites such as the Mount of Olives, the Via Dolorosa, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre or the Garden Tomb. They identify with Jesus, the Virgin Mary and John the Baptist. Jewish sufferers tend to identify with Samson, Moses and King David.

Cults are another concern, said Bar-El. The disappearance in October of the doomsday group, Concerned Christians, a Denver cult reportedly headed to Jerusalem to commit mass suicide before the millennium, is just one of many cases police and psychiatrists will have to deal with during this Christmas season and next.

Meanwhile, Father Claudio Baratto of the Agency for Guarding the Holy Sites in Israel, said his institution, which takes care of Christian shrines throughout Israel in conjuction with the state, is not worried about the number of tourists coming en masse to Israel, and said they do not have any special plans for keeping the sites safe.

A bumper crop year for 'Jewish' films

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — This year has seen a bumper crop of "Jewish" films and videos, many of which are now available at your local video store.

The most memorable is The Truce, the stirring story of Italian writer Primo Levi. Levi was a young chemist when World War II broke out and he joined a group of partisans in the mountains. The Germans quickly tracked down the inexperienced freedom fighters and sent them to Auschwitz.

The Truce opens with the liberation of Auschwitz and follows Levi's tortured attempts to return to his native Italy. John Turturro gives a truly memorable performance as Levi.

This year also saw the video release of two significant documentaries: Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies, and the American Dream and The Long Way Home.

Hollywoodism, directed by Torontonian Simcha Jacobovici, describes the creation of the Hollywood studio system by a small group of Jews who were driven out of eastern Europe and saw in Hollywood an opportunity to create an America in the image of their own hopes and dreams.

Whether or not you agree with its premise, Hollywoodism is a fascinating study of the power a few Jewish men were able to gain in a very short period of time and the influence they exercised over the American way of life.

The Long Way Home is the Academy Award-winning documentary produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. It details the trials and tribulations encountered by Holocaust survivors attempting to flee eastern Europe and make their way to their new homeland in Palestine. It is a story and a film worth viewing many times.

A number of films made for cable television were also released on video this year, including The Rescuers: Stories In Courage, a series of one-hour films co-produced by Barbra Streisand, and broadcast on Showtime in the United States.

The first video in the series, Two Women, consists of two films about individual women who risked their lives to save Jews from the Nazis.

The second video, Two Couples, also consists of two films, each about a married couple who sheltered Jews in their homes during World War II.

Also from cable is A Call To Remember, a moving story about a married couple who survived the war and came to the United States to start a new life and family. After almost 20 years, the wife learns her son from a pre-war marriage is alive and will be coming to America soon.

Not In This Town is another made-for-cable film about a true incident in Billings, Mont., involving a local hate group which tried to turn the town against its minorities, only to be stopped by the courage of a Jewish woman and the local sheriff.

Twilight of the Golds is a bit of a hybrid. Originally produced for cable, it was shown theatrically for a short time. The film deals with a Jewish couple who must decide whether to abort a pregnancy as a result of tests done on the fetus. It presents a moral dilemma that is worth watching and discussing.

American Pop is an animated feature tracing four generations of American musicians from the time they fled Russian pogroms to modern times when the youngest member of the family has lost all memory of his Jewish ancestry. It is a chilling story of assimilation and lost roots.

Also released on video this year were I Love, I Love You Not and I Love You Don't Touch Me. The first, I Love You, I Love You Not, is a film about the teenage granddaughter of a Holocaust survivor who learns her friends may be more prejudiced than she expected. The second, I Love You Don't Touch Me, is the story of a Jewish woman and her romantic entanglements.

Some other "Jewish" releases:

• The Tango Lesson, a small independent film about a Jewish filmmaker seduced by tango dancing who offers to trade a film role for dance lessons and romance.

• A Price Above Rubies, a troubling film about a Chassidic woman getting involved in a series of affairs.

• The Assignment, an action film about a team of Israeli and American agents tracking the notorious terrorist Carlos the Jackal.

• Family of Cops, two films about a family of Jewish police officers featuring Charles Bronson in the lead role.

Eye on Arts

MAYNE FETED IN ISRAEL FOR BOOK OF POEMS

Seymour Mayne, a prolific poet and professor of English at the University of Ottawa, recently visited Israel to launch The City of the Hidden (Gevanim, Tel Aviv), his fourth book of poems to be translated into Hebrew.

Mayne was recently profiled in Israel's Ha'Aretz Magazine. "To be Jewish does not contradict being Canadian," he said. "As a writer, editor and anthologist publishing in Canada for 40 years, I feel totally at home and accepted."

Not only did Mayne boast of Canada's many well-known Jewish writers, such as Klein, Layton, Waddington, Cohen, Richler and Michaels, he also mentioned a more obscure name – Isidore Ascher, a Montreal Jewish poet who started writing in the late 19th century.

Acknowledging that he has spent at least five of the last 30 years in Israel, Mayne admitted he does not always feel like an insider in Israel. "No matter how close I may feel to my Israeli friends, I don't share their day-to-day reality," he said. "I come from a quiet, civil and rather undramatic society in the north of North America. Israel is the diametric opposite of Canada, politically, socially and weatherwise."

The Israel Association for Canadian Studies, the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies and the Canada Council of the Arts joined in sponsoring a poetry reading by Mayne last month at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's campus on Mount Scopus.

Names in the News: Murray Frum, the Toronto-based real estate developer and philanthropist, has recently been named head of the charitable arm of the Ontario Arts Council. Meanwhile his daughter, Linda Frum, a board member on the arts council, is a columnist for Toronto's new daily, the National Post. Son and brother David Frum has appeared in the Post as well.

• David Buchbinder, leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and creative director of the biennial Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, wrote some of the music for the soundtrack of Jerry and Tom, a big-budget American film that opened recently in Toronto.

The film features Maury Chaykin in a lead role and was directed by Saul Rubinek, who can be seen briefly in one of the scenes. Both Rubinek and Chaykin are Torontonians who have made it big in Hollywood.

• Speaking of Ashkenaz, the lively week-long celebration of Yiddishkeit attracted more than 70,000 people to Harbourfront in the summer of 1997.

Planning is well under way for Ashkenaz '99, which is slated for Aug. 30 to Sept. 6. According to plans, the fest will open with a large parade and will feature the Ashkenaz Orchestra Project, a 20-piece ensemble of the hottest international Yiddish musicians, performing new works commissioned for the festival. Volunteers wanted. 703-6892. Web site [www.ashkenaz.org].

In the Spotlight: Cellist Shaun Rolston has been captivating audiences worldwide since the age of two. She made a spectacular debut at New York's Town Hall at the age of 16, and usually wins critical claim whenever she performs.

"Her relationships with the instrument was completely natural; no physical movement was alien, and her own breathing was intimately related to the music's," commented a New York Times reviewer about one of her performances.

A member of the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto, Rolston recently recorded a CD with Bernadene Blaha on piano, featuring music by Richard Strauss, Claude Debussy, Samuel Barber, Witold Lutoslawki and Olivier Messiaen. The CD is on the CBC record label.

Jubilee Award goes to Brampton

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deciding to do business in Israel made good sense for Nortel Networks, says John Roth, vice-chairman and CEO of the company.

Recently, David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, presented Roth with the Israel Jubilee Award for Business in recognition of Nortel's substantial investments in Israel.

The award states, in part, that the Brampton-based firm "has demonstrated a long-term commitment to building a world-class telecommunications network in Israel. In cooperation with Telrad, Nortel Networks introduced the first digital telecommunications switch in Israel in 1982. The company continues to demonstrate its commitment to Israel through recent projects with the Ministry of Defence, Cellcom, Baraq and Gold Lines."

The presentation came two months after the Jubilee Business Summit hosted by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. At the summit – held in part to introduce Israel to international business leaders not acquainted with the Israeli economy – Netanyahu presented the Israel Jubilee Award to companies that had invested more than $50 million in the economy of Israel.

For companies considering doing business with Israel – or any foreign country – patience, persistence and the formation of a partnership are "absolutely critical," Roth told The CJN. "You need to make a long-term commitment."

Over the years, Telrad ended up doing a lot of research and development for Nortel. The Israeli company now manufactures variants of Nortel products that are sold in many countries, said Roth.

Nortel networks has a presence in over 150 countries and territories, with offices and facilities in North America, Europe, Asia/Pacific, the Caribbean and Latin America, the Middle East and Africa.

Firm eyes Israel

TORONTO — Club Monaco Inc. announced last week it will be opening stores in Israel as early as next year.

"Israel has long been an important target market for Club Monaco," said Sol Nayman, Club Monaco's chief operating officer in Toronto. "Israeli consumers have a strong awareness of Club Monaco, which they have acquired from their travels to North America."

Nayman said the first store is expected to open in the fall of 1999 although he refused to say exactly where until all the arrangements are made and contracts signed.

He did say it will probably be in a shopping mall of a major city.

If all goes well Nayman envisions around five stores within the next three years. "We have to grow with a focus not simply for the sake of growing," he said.

Club Monaco has over 120 stores in North America and Asia. It markets men's, women's and children's apparel, home fashions, and color cosmetics and licenses jewelry and eyewear.

DIG AT YAVNEH YAM NEEDS VOLUNTEERS

Yavneh Yam, an ancient site on the Mediterranean between Jaffa and Ashdod, is revealing its secrets to archeologists.

Since 1992, a team of archeologists has uncovered remains from the Hellenistic period to the Middle Ages, including buildings, mosaic pavements, fine ceramics and glass objects, metal artifacts and many coins. An oil lamp depicting the seven-branch menorah (circa 4th-5th century CE) has also been unearthed.

The dig, headed by Prof. Moshe Fischer of the classics department at Tel Aviv University, is focused on establishing the nature of the encounter and conflict between Near Eastern civilizations and the Greek and Roman culture on the coast of Eretz Yisrael.

The Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University has been assisting to publicize and find volunteers for the dig's fifth season, scheduled from July 11 to Aug. 20, 1999. Volunteers may sign up for one or more of three two-week periods within this six-week time frame.

The fee for two weeks of participation is $600 (US), including full board and accommodation at the modern Youth Village Ayanoth. Also included, is an introductory course to archeology of the Holy Land, and visits to sites of interest. The application deadline is next April.

For further details, contact Prof. Moshe Fischer, Dept. of Classics, Tel Aviv University, 69978 Ramat Aviv, Israel. Phone 972-3-6409938. E-mail, [fischer@ccsg.tau.ac.il], or contact the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University. Phone 787-9930. E-mail, [cftau@ interlog. com]

Film documents survivors' lifetime bonds

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two local Holocaust survivors are among seven women to be featured in an upcoming 90-minute documentary by French filmmaker Joseph Morder.

The film, which is to be shown on German and French television, will likely be titled Mes Sept Mères (My Seven Mothers). It's the story of Morder's mother Hela and six other women – among them Guta Lederman and Freda Rosenberg of Toronto – who forged a lifetime bond, after being forced to work on a Nazi military base as young teens.

"They're special women. I would hope if I didn't do this film, someone else would," Morder told The CJN in October when he was in town filming. "It's a kind of wonderful story about life, how life can win in the middle of hell...it's stronger than anything."

Morder, 49, has touched on Jewish or autobiographical themes in other films, both fiction and non-fiction. A native of Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, he spent most of his early years in Ecuador before his family settled in Paris when he was 12.

He began filming in 1967 and still carries a small Super 8 camera to create his own film diary. A crew member described Morder's style as obsessive and very precise.

But the prolific filmmaker – he's made over 500 films in the past 30 years – said he is careful to avoid any impression of heavy-handedness. He likes to compare his film to Austro-Hungarian pastry. "It's very light, nice to see, good to eat – but the background is very dramatic."

At the end of October, having travelled to Florida, Texas and Israel with his small film crew, Morder brought the women together in Paris, where his mother lives, for an emotional week-long reunion.

"They're very joyful women," said Morder. "They love life. I think that's their strength."

Lederman and Hela Morder were schoolmates in Radom, Poland as youngsters. But their education was cruelly disrupted by the Holocaust.

One day the two friends were accosted on the street by a soldier and taken to a Nazi military base, where they were forced into work cleaning barracks, making beds and rearranging furniture.

Although initially they were able to return to the ghetto at night, eventually they had to remain at the base around the clock. There were nine of them, all but one, young teens. One woman, at least a decade older, did not survive the war; another died a natural death in adulthood.

For a year, until the beginning of 1943, they worked together, ate together and slept in the same room. "We became like an extended family," said Rosenberg in a recent interview. "We only had each other."

"They helped each other," said Morder. "They saved each other's lives. If I'm living, it's thanks to them."

In one incident, a soldier threatened to shoot one of the group because he didn't like her "dark Jewish eyes." Somehow, said Lederman, they persuaded him not to.

The women survived the war, for the most part, in separate concentration camps, maintaining an optimistic outlook.

"Nobody could believe at that time that we [would lose] everybody," Lederman explained. Of her immediate family, she and a sister survived. Rosenberg, the second oldest of six children, was the only survivor of her immediate family.

After the war, all seven married and raised families. Some of the children have visited their mothers' friends overseas.

The reunion in Paris marked the first time the seven women had been together since 1943. They were guests of honor at a banquet held by Paris' Radom Society to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary.

"The closeness is still there," said Rosenberg.

The women, now in their early 70s, spent the days sightseeing and being filmed, and the nights sitting up late, talking in their hotel lobby.

"There were good memories and bad memories," said Lederman. "We were very happy and very sad."

Rosenberg initially had mixed emotions about doing the film, although – like Lederman, who had told her story for Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation – she had already documented her experience for Toronto's Holocaust Memorial & Education Centre.

"Then I thought, 'Why not?' " said Rosenberg. "We might as well do it and let the world know. There are still some skeptics who deny it."

From left, Freda Rosenberg, Guta Lederman and French filmmaker Joseph Morder enjoy some down time in a Paris restaurant. Morder reunited the two Toronto women with his mother and four others from the United States and Israel, for an upcoming European television documentary.

Israel behind in treatment of stress disorder: expert

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Dr. Danny Brom

TORONTO — It seems incongruous, but Israel – where stress and even trauma are routine – is lagging in the treatment of people with psychological disorders induced by trauma.

The Jewish state "is far behind services for the traumatized," says Dr. Danny Brom, an internationally recognized expert on Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), who lives and works in Israel. "And the country is not coming around to the realization that this is a serious problem.

"It's a paradox. In Israel, there's a lot of stress, but a lot of denial."

Brom, author of the recently released book Coping With Trauma, is scientific coordinator of the Albert and Temmy Latner Institute, located at Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

The Latner institute, set up in 1991, and named for its Canadian benefactors, has developed a worldwide reputation for providing psychological services to victims of terrorist attacks and family of soldiers killed in military actions, as well as to Holocaust survivors. It has also successfully reached out to the haredi community.

Even though the American Psychological Association began attaching a label to post-trauma victims in 1980, the Israeli medical and psychological establishments are still slow to regard PTSD as a clinical malfunction, Brom says.

That's odd, he adds, considering that living in Israel can be traumatic.

Traffic accidents – for which Israel has become infamous – are a major cause of PTSD, Brom says. So are terrorist attacks on civilians, war, and the country's rising rate of violent crime.

And the recent spate of Holocaust-related lawsuits the world over has raised anxiety levels and rage among Israel's 350,000 Holocaust survivors, explained Brom during a recent stop in Toronto, where he met with psychologists and psychiatrists.

Brom is also director of research for Amcha, an organization that provides psycho-social support for Holocaust survivors in Israel.

"Nowadays in Israel, you can talk about the Holocaust. It's open. For many years, you couldn't." But that new openness has also opened many old wounds.

PTSD is characterized by feelings of helplessness, vulnerability and the shattering of old assumptions. Victims often re-experience their trauma in nightmares and flashbacks. Many can't sleep. For some sufferers, it's debilitating.

But Brom says not everyone who has a traumatic experience falls apart. People are surprisingly resilient.

Between ten and 20 percent of those who undergo trauma wind up with PTSD. In the United States, roughly two percent of the population has it.

The Dutch-born Brom, who made aliyah in 1979, describes the disorder this way: "It's when your coping mechanism gets stuck. You get the feeling [the trauma] is not over. You are in denial or you avoid all stimuli. It takes away your control."

In Israel, "there are a lot of people who no longer travel on buses, or they avoid places where a bomb once went off. Every bomb, every threat, triggers anxiety. The Gulf War triggered a lot."

Brom has found that the most effective therapy is quick, short-term intervention.

The therapist works toward re-stimulating the victim, and breaking his or her avoidance patterns. As well, since PTSD sufferers often have no words to describe what they feel, therapy can force the stimulation of the part of the brain that controls language, giving words to the anxiety.

Hypnosis can also be used to push trauma into the recesses of memory.

Brom says new therapies have led to a 70 percent success rate. "It's not a complete cure, but at least you can function."

He has found that in Israel, the most denial about trauma and stress comes, ironically, from the military.

Physician receives award

TORONTO — Mount Sinai Hospital's Dr. Paul Walfish, a leader in thyroid gland research, recently received one of the top physician awards in the province for his excellence in providing patient care.

Dr. Walfish was one of five physicians to receive the 1998/99 Council Award from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario.

His research has led to the development of tests and treatment for a variety of thyroid disease problems.

Walfish's major contributions to the medical community and society include the development of newborn screening methods to prevent some types of developmental disorders through early detection and treatment, and tests to detect disturbances of thyroid function occurring in mothers after delivery.

The tests and procedures developed by Walfish have become accepted practice in the Canadian and international medical communities for the past 20 years, and have had a significant impact on health care in Ontario and around the world.

330 OBITUARIES

WITH DEEPEST SYMPATHY

Our hearts go out to our daughter-in-law Dora Ennis Weinberg on the shocking and devastating death of her beloved Mother and Father, Toby and Harry Fish. A devoted, sensitive and caring daughter, Dora enjoyed a rare and special intimate relationship with her parents.

We hope and pray that the love of her husband Barry and their daughter Johanna will provide Dora with the great strength necessary to survive this terrible and tragic circumstance.

Jay Fiedler

QB a backup with Vikings

By MORDECAI SPECKTOR
The American Jewish World

MINNEAPOLIS — In the cozy press room at Winter Park, the Minnesota Vikings purple-splattered headquarters and practice facility in suburban Eden Prairie, Jay Fiedler talked with reporters about his dream of being a starting quarterback in the NFL.

The Jewish native of Oceanside, N.Y., who helped lead Dartmouth University to three Ivy League football championships, was cut by the Vikings just before the start of the regular season. When starting quarterback Brad Johnson broke his leg early in the year, Fiedler got the call to return to the team.

By mid-season, Johnson had mended and returned to the number 2 QB slot, behind veteran Randall Cunningham, who was in the midst of a sensational season. Despite his move down the depth chart, Fiedler was philosophical about his third-string duties.

"Every time you're on a roster and dressing for a game, there's always a chance that you're going to be out there," he said. "When that time comes for me – unfortunately, injuries happen in the league, guys do go down – and I get a chance to play in regular action, I've got to go out and prove that I can play."

Every player wants to be in the starting lineup, Fiedler admitted, "but not everyone gets that chance. Right now I'm kind of biding my time. If I ever get that chance, which is what I'd love to have happen, I just want to make the most of it."

Anything can happen on the brutal NFL gridirons, the 26-year-old play-caller noted. And in the midst of an early November battle against the New Orleans Saints at the Hubert Humphrey Metrodome in Minneapolis, it did.

When the dust had cleared that Sunday, the Vikings had another victory, but starting QB Cunningham (who Fiedler backed up in Philadelphia in 1994-95) injured his knee on the third play of the game. Brad Johnson came in and played a great game, but he fractured the thumb on his throwing hand.

Suddenly, Fiedler was thrust into the role as Vikings' starting quarterback – and became the number 1 topic among Twin Cities sports writers and gridiron mavens. ESPN featured him on their early morning show.

The fate of the rampaging Vikings rested on the shoulders of the 6-foot-1, 214-pound quarterback, who had thrown only four passes in his NFL career (he never got into a game while with the Eagles and played only briefly this year against Washington and Detroit).

"It's a fairy tale," Fiedler told the reporters then crowding around. "I've had a lot of ups and downs. Right now, my roller-coaster is riding to the top."

But, alas, the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Sid Luckman was tuned into another game: Randall Cunningham bounced back from arthroscopic knee surgery on Monday and was tapped for the following Sunday's start against the Cincinnati Bengals. Fiedler went back to backup.

Fortunately, this turn of events didn't devastate the persistent Fiedler, who started his athletic career at age five when he won the national cross-country championship for his age bracket. The intelligent and personable quarterback was out of the NFL for two years before signing with the Vikings in the spring. Last year, he played for the Amsterdam Admirals of the World League ("A fun experience...a good excuse to travel through Europe and see some sights, and play football as well," he said), and then coached wide receivers at Hofstra University on Long Island, N.Y.

"Things have been going great for me," Fiedler said during the chat at Winter Park (named after sports impresario Max Winter, the late Jewish businessman who brought the NFL to Minnesota in 1961). "It's been a great year, hooking on with the team and making it back into the NFL. To come back on a team like this is a little icing on the cake."

From a Reform Jewish family heavily into sports, Fiedler has "always been a serious kid and he's always known what he wants to do," said his older brother, Scott, an assistant basketball coach at Wagner College in Staten Island, N.Y.

Ken Fiedler, their father, was a high school basketball coach for 30 years, and took a number of young athletes under his wing, including Anthony Mason, the NBA star now with the Charlotte Hornets.

Although Randall Cunningham played most of the game against New Orleans, with a 24-3 Vikings lead and 7:54 remaining, Fiedler came in. He hit receiver Jake Reed with a pass for a first down, but the offensive series ended when Fiedler underthrew a pass to rookie sensation Randy Moss that was picked off.

On his next series, Fiedler skillfully engineered a ground attack and moved the Vikings downfield; then it was time to run out the clock and trot off the field with a 9-1 record for the season.

"Jay was solid," declared Vikings coach Dennis Green after the game. "It was kind of nice that he had that action."

In the Vikings locker room, Fiedler wore a towel around his waist and a smile. "It was a crazy week, that's for sure," he said in regard to all the press attention. "It ended up in a win, and that's the most important thing."

As for his third chance to play in an NFL game, Fiedler remarked, "It felt good. I went out there and felt like I made a couple good plays. It was fun out there."

Two weeks ago against Baltimore, Fiedler substituted for Cunningham on one play, throwing an incomplete pass. The week before, he saw action in a mop-up role against Chicago in a 48-22 win. He was in uniform but didn't play in late November matchups against Green Bay and Dallas, and his season high was registered in an October game against Washington when he completed two passes out of four attempts for 29 yards.

The Milewski matter

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Everything has a Jewish angle, a wag once said, and it's no different with the current imbroglio between reporter Terry Milewski and his bosses at the CBC. Milewski's relentless (and lone) digging unearthed explosive allegations that the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) ordered the RCMP to pepper-spray students protesting human rights abuses in Asia at last year's APEC summit in Vancouver. But he tripped up when he exchanged e-mails with one of the student protesters, in which he referred to the federal government as "the forces of darkness." Officials in the PMO cried bias. The CBC agreed, and suspended Milewski for three days for the indiscreet missives, and another 15 days for an unauthorized article in the Globe and Mail, in which he defended himself and the CBC against the PMO's charges.

Two weeks ago, the CBC's ombudsman, David Bazay, withdrew from his investigation of the matter, citing Milewski's refusal to cooperate. Bazay, the watchdog for the CBC's English services, dumped the file into the lap of his French-language counterpart, Marcel Pépin.

Why didn't Milewski play ball? He insisted the CBC reverse a ruling against him over a complaint from Doug Collins, a veteran Vancouver newspaper columnist with a long and wretched history of anti-Semitic writing under his belt. Milewski, justifiably, said the CBC couldn't possibly (or legitimately) probe a serious matter like APEC when it ruled in favor of a notorious and public Holocaust denier.

CJN readers will recognize Collins as a one-time columnist for Vancouver's North Shore News, and himself the subject of more than one complaint. After years of belittling the Holocaust, Collins one day penned a column titled Swindler's List, in which he claimed the Holocaust was Jewish propaganda, and that at the most, a few hundred thousand Jews died in the camps.

Last year, a British Columbia human rights panel ruled that while Collins' comments were anti-Semitic, they did not violate human rights laws. Another tribunal is now considering a similar complaint against him.

Collins, as is his wont, filed a grievance against the CBC for a Milewski report that aired on The National last March. The report was about racist Internet sites out west, and although Milewski had interviewed Collins for the story, he did not include Collins' specific views on the Web sites. Milewski did, however, refer to Collins this way: "Columnist Doug Collins... says the Holocaust is Jewish propaganda."

In a response last May, Don Knox, acting head of CBC TV News, politely tore a strip out of Collins, saying "you have made it plain, frequently and publicly... that you do not accept the incontrovertible facts of history. Instead, you believe in a fictional Holocaust." Yet still, Bazay ruled in favor of Collins just four months later. No wonder Milewski was peeved.

But in another twist, Bazay last week agreed to review his decision. Stunningly, the review upheld the original ruling as justified. In his three-page summary, Bazay chides Milewski for including only his own description of Collins, and excluding Collins' actual comments about the Web sites.

Furthermore, writes Bazay, "there was no evidence that Collins actually ever said 'the Holocaust is Jewish propaganda.' Milewski acknowledges that these were his words and not Collins' views about the Holocaust. I can accept that this was a reasonable journalistic description of Collins' views about the Holocaust. (Italics mine). But it does not follow that the March 22 item provided viewers with a fair and accurate account of what Collins said about the Web sites."

(Careful about being perceived as a defender of a Holocaust denier, Bazay adds that with this ruling, he is "not in any way whatsoever sanctioning anything Collins has had to say about the Holocaust.")

Contacted by The CJN, an irate and exasperated Milewski called the latest ruling "a disgrace to the CBC. Once again, Bazay has bestowed the blessing of the CBC on someone who treats the truth with utter contempt."

So Milewski is keelhauled for putting his thoughts in writing, while Collins scores a win against the mighty CBC.

Strange thing, this free speech.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am 68 years old. I have hardly seen or heard from my family for many years. I was living with a wonderful lady for the last six years, and she recently died. I have been living with pain in my back for four years. I go from doctor to doctor, from emergency room to emergency room, and nobody seems to be able to help me. Every time I see another doctor I get another set of prescriptions. My apartment is a mess, I have no appetite, I smoke too much and my diabetes is a problem. Who can help me?

Mr. T.

Dear Mr. T.,

The first problem that needs to be resolved is your health. You are living with pain that you do not feel has been clearly diagnosed. You sound frustrated and do not know what to do next.

Social service agencies that help seniors have intake, referral and consultation departments that provide home visits and assessments, referrals and direction. Social workers are able to arrange for your health care to be coordinated through a geriatric department of an acute-care hospital. Home care can be arranged to provide some meal preparation and help you to relearn how to organize your home in the areas of cleaning, shopping and nutrition.

You may want assistance to become more involved in groups and activities so that you are not alone. Perhaps with this kind of support, your children will begin to see you in a more positive light and begin to find enjoyment in the quality of their interactions with you.

Agencies have many opportunities available in the areas of bereavement supports and volunteer work that often help someone in your situation rebuild their lives with a sense of meaning, dignity and compassion.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.
